> What Bennett says of the Republicans. The New York Herald does not form a very high opinion of its new political associates. In its last issue it discourses as follows respecting the want among the Republicans of the qualities that conduct to success:

"From Banks down to the latest converts to republicanism, they all lack courage and selfconfidence. They can talk and jabber and write by the hour or the day or the week; but when comes to action, they are weak in the knees, and a very slight contest wears them out. The least noise or clamor scares them out of their senses, and they are ready to retreat, and wheel about and beg to be forgives.

We have watched the course of these republicans for some time, and all along we have seen symptoms that they were as a deficient in courage ; whence we have inferred that when the final tussle did come between themselves and their opponents, they would, unless they altered their character materially, inevitably go to the
