AN EXPLOSION ON THE OHIO RIVER. A MINGULAR RECONTRE.

On the first day of March, ten years ago, the new, palatial, and powerful steamboat "Siren" floated away from her wharf at Cincinnati, bound for the port of New Orleans, and carrying a gay crowd of passengers, who had been attracted by the splendor of her appearance and the renown of her speed, safety, and luxurious accommodations. As she moved off, walking the sunny waters so truly like a thing of life, a smiling throng stood on the hurricane deck waving their handkerchiefs to friends on the shore, and every | hissaid in his ear-"Let me see you on the hurrithing, even the very air, seemed eloquent of hope | cane deck." and happiness.'

The multitude consisted of the usual miscella neous characters to be found on western vessels. There migh be seen well so proximity thrising merchants with their stand longer like look, poliiticians with sculptured courtesy in every feature, mere pleasure seekers in easy attitudes, and a sprinkling of black whiskered gentry; whose restless eyes, over dr. ss. and profusion of jewels betrayed their acquaintance with the history of the four queeus Besides these, a number of neighborhood of the bar

Every description of beauty might be studied there as in a picture galleryblue eyed and bright haired belle of the north, the lazzling daughters of Kentucky, and th charming creole with languid air and fice nke the love light of a dream. All on board seemed payous in their particular ways. No. doubt darkened the general festivity, and aimost floor every one appeared to have companious or friends inverse and the interchange of civil

"I must, however, mention an exception to the remark. There was a gentleman of fine form and strikingly handsome countenance, with bril hant gray eyes, and a high; white, intellectual forchead, who made no acquaintances, and, indeed did not appear to desire any, as he continued to mouth walk the hurricane dock in a state of profound and somewhat inpurated abstriction long after everybody else had gone below. He was dressed in a suit of costry brack cloth, entirely without ornaments, and were a piece of crape round his ; hat as a token of recent pereavement. Several of the curious had noticed the str nizer when he came on board, and saw him register his name as "Captain M Thomas, of Texas;" but some of to yield the inquisitive parties happened to be old Texans themselves, and they all concurred in the declaration that they had never heard of such a man is the territory illuminated by the lone star, and one or two suggested that he must be an impos:

She was a girl some eighteen years of agrobed in deep mourning, and whether it might be this circumstance, exerting sympathy by calling to mind his own sorrow, or the peculiar; charm of hell that no heroism has power to recharms of her person, which fascinated his soul, Captain Thomas did not attempt, on the instant, to determine; but he felt an immediate and almost magical interest in the sad visage shinning from the opposite scat

It is true, he did not at first think her very beautiful. Her form and features, though exquisitely symmetrical, looked too small and child like for such a poetical epithet; for the term litter with might be applied to her as a whole and apparently in every part. Her face, bust, bustom, hands, feet, were all little, save a pair of large almond shaped eyes, dark as night, and curtained by long raven lashies, which gave them a soft dreamy expression, while the rich black hair and golden warmth of her southern complexion furnished a striking resemblance to the favorite portrait of the immortal Titish.

The captain could not remove his gaze from the unique visage before him. Had be seen that face somewhere in his wanderings in Italy or the sunny Orient? He thought so; but misty memory, revolving the vague shadows of the past, could fix on no definite time or placefor identity, and he discarded the illusion as the image of a dream.

Presently she raised her dark eyes, and, slightly starting, scrutinised his countenance in her turn, with signs of strange emotion, and then, faintly blushing, withdrew ber glance, and soon returned to the parlor. But Captain Thomes as sought in vain to banish from his mind that one look, luminous as lightning, which had flashed through his brain when their eyes met. It appeared like both a recognition from the past and a revelation of the future, and yet be could not imagine what was the charm that so wonderfully moved him. It could not be love, or even admiration, for he had often beheld more beautiful features without so much as an additional heart throb, but none had ever inspired him with such deep interest and so earnest.
