the same words over and over again : "They are all gone—ay brother Max, my wife, my little Joseph, my sister Agatha, and Barah my nicee! I and my little bit of box are left alone together in the world. Mosart can sing no more. He has sung to the last of them now !" The second day there was no change in him. On the third, Hosamond placed the Book of Hymns reverently on her mother's boson; haid a sole of her swn hair round it, and kissed the sad, peaceful face for the last time. The old man was with her at that silent loave-taking, and followed her away when it was over. By the side of the colla, and, afterward, when she took him back with her to her husband, he was
