naw something flash.

The old gate swung upon its rusty hinges, and the lovers took the path leading to the back door. Mrs. Smith heard his last charge to Kate, to be punctual at the hour, and hastily ran to the front door she was comfortably rocking in her arm chair as unconcerned as though nothing had happened.

That night Smith dreamed lovely dreams, how he would fly with the idol of his affections, and evade the search of those whose revengeful dispesitions would tempt them to follow, but Mrs. Smith dreamed how he would'nt and how much he would repent of ever baving ventured upon so basardons an experiment; and how liable were human hopes to blast, and the fondest dreams to vanish in thin air.

But how to frustrate his plans was the question. She did'nt sleep when she dreamed, but she decided upon a plan of oction, and then drop ped herself in the arms of Morpheus. She arose early prepared a good breakfast, and expressed herself quite uneasy about Smith's health, as his appetite seemed to be very poor, and had been getting so for some time past. Smith tried to be particularly good that day, and had not Nanoy been in the secret, she would have taken his intentions for genuine love. Smith informed Nancy at dinner that he had some urgent busi. ness on hand and that he should not probably be at home to suppor. Mrs. Smith was very sorry but could'nt help it.

Night came on and so did ten o'clock which time found Smith at the foot of the lane. A fe male form closely enveloped sprang into his carriage, and Smith embracing her fondly, drove off as mindly as his fast horses could carry them (In, on they drove, elinging to each other in all the teaderness of affection, he snatching a kiss every now and then from the nectar lips which only spoke in sighing whispers.

Smith deelared it the happiest moment in his loving protestations with a warmer embrade. Smith longed for the light once more, that he might look into her love beaming eyes and read the tender thought she could not speak. Light did come at last and when the faintest streak of crimson tinged the eastern hills with a mellow light, Smith sought at once to feast his eyes upon lines, which Nancy caught; tried to say some thing; but his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth. Nancy roguishly smiled and said

"Look into my loving eyes, Jim," but Jim would'nt do it, although she declared it to be the happing moment of her life. "James," and she, do you see that house you. that is mine, and shall not care for any one clse."

"I will be there at the hour," said Kate; 'and now we must go in or Nancy will be uneasy."
But before they disturbed the ugly gate Smith drew Kate to his beart in one fond loving em-brace, and smack went a kins upon her upturned lips. As Smith turned around he thought he saw something flash.
