On the third day, fifteen States were represented, and 564 delegates were present, thus: 20 Indiana

14 Iowa,
34 Texas,
22 Mississippi,
9 Tennessee,
1 Virginia,
6 Pennsylvania,
21 Louisiana, Kentucky,

During the day, Mr. Calhoun took accasion to ering everything constitutional that may be called National. He said that no work strictly speaking, could derive constitutionality from its nationality. There was no nationality beyond the Constitution. river and its principal tributaries are to be regarded as inland seas, and they are as much entitled to appropriations by Congress for their improvement, as the harbors, bays, and coast of the Atlantic." Notwithstanding this protest, the convention throughout its session seemed to treat nationality as one of the chief tests of constitutionality.

On Saturday morning, after a few unimportant resolutions were passed, the numerous committees began to submit their reports, which proved to be generally very voluminous. The convention submitted to the reading of one or two, but it was soon ordered that only the titles and resolutions should be read, and that the body be omitted. In this way all were speedily got through, and then the convention began to take up each singly for discussion and amendment. At this juncture every one was appalled. It would be impossible to get through in less than a week with the reading and considering of all these reports, with the thousand amendments that would be offered, and with hearing the thousand speeches that would be made.

It was subsequently determined to refer the whole matter to a special committee of one from each State; and a committee was accordingly ap-pointed, with Governor Jones of Tennessee, as Chairman.

On Saturday, the following Report was made

1. Resolved, That the reports of the
