

DIED.
At Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, on Sunday the 23rd ult., at the residence of his brother-in-law, David R. Porter, Esq., Mrs. JANE MARSHALL, the widow of the late George Marshall.

From the Harrisburg Telegraph, we make an extract from an Obituary notice, as follows, viz: Mrs. Marshall married in early life, but was bereaved of her husband after the lapse of a few years. In the year 1821 she became a member of the family in whose bosom she died. Childless herself, her chief occupation, during this long period, was the care of a large family of children. With what unwearied kindness, she discharged the duties of this relation, how faithfully she impressed on the youthful mind her lessons of forbearance and moderation, how eloquently by her example, she advocated the cause of virtue—that would indeed require more than the compass of an obituary to portray. She was a generous, unselfish, confiding, truthful woman. To bitterness, envy, and pride, she was a stranger. The charity of her heart was comprehensive and sincere. Even to the large class of persons who rank political detractors among the duties of life, she was able without an effort to extend forgiveness. She was born for the enjoyment of peace, and she lived and died at peace with the world, with herself, and with God. The disease which terminated her life, was protracted and painful. During its continuance, she was attended by physicians, over whose skill she had not the slightest apprehension, and who, in their turn, contributed all that skill and care could administer for her relief. But far above all physical sufferings, her immortal spirit was sustained in a manner which might well render the case worthy of more permanent record. About twenty years preceding her death, she had made a profession of her faith, under the ministry of the Rev. John Polkes, of Huntington, Penn'a. In the early stages of her last illness, she suffered much from despondency and doubt. Of this she was subsequently relieved in a sudden and remarkable manner. She experienced a clear and vivid sense of the pardon of her sins, to which she made frequent allusion. She maintained that, great as they were, she had seen them all pardoned, one by one. From that time, she experienced entire freedom from doubts, and tasted the purest spiritual joy. Within a few hours of her departure, when in the very act of struggling in death, one of her physicians said, "You are suffering very much." "O! yes," was the reply; "but I am so happy!" "In a short time the light of the Sabbath broke over her sufferings, and before it departed, the light of an eternal Sabbath shined, as we firmly trust, dived on the soul of the sufferer. O grave! where is thy victory!"
