Gratitude of New Orleans.

The New Orleans Bee, in alluding to the generous contributions made in Northern cities for the sufferers in New Orleans, observes:

These are but samples of a generous spirit which seems to pervade the entire North, and, to a minor extent, the South. We record them with feelings of unalloyed gratification. We believe that, out of America, one might look in vain for such splendid illustrations of fraternal kindness.

But we are but one people—a nation of brothers—linked together by common institutions and a common destiny. We may now and then squabble, even as differences will arise among families and kindred, but let calanity overtake may part of this great fraternity, and warm sympathics are at once awakened, and ready hands are stretched forth to success and to save. The people of New Orleans will bear in constant and grateful recollection the munificent charities of which her distressed and plague stricken poor have been the object.
