THE LATE MURDER AT ALTOONA.

The recent shocking murder at Altoona, of which a brief notice has already appeared in our columns continues to cause a great excitement in the district where it was perpetrated. After our paper went to press on Saturday, Mr. McMaster, proprietor of the Eagle Hotel, received a telegraphic despatch from Altoona, asking for information in regard to the personal appearance, dress &c., of David McKinney, who put up at the above named hotel in company with S. L. Norcross, the murdered man. It will be recalled that McKinney and Norcross left on the Pennsylvania Railroad in the 9:30 P. M. train on Thursday. The despatch states that the deceased and another man were seen passing through Altoona after the arrival of the train, and that the stranger has not since been seen or heard from. A razor was found beside the body of Norcross, which would indicate that he had committed suicide. About twenty dollars and a silver watch were found in a carpet sack lying near the body. These circumstances tend to the conclusion that neither robbery nor murder had been committed. But the most important fact conveyed in the despatch is, that the head of the deceased bears a remarkable resemblance to that of the man who was seen with a club, and a club was found near the body. It is plain, then, that a murder has been committed. A lunatic could not break his skull with a club, and then cut his throat from ear to ear, or vice versa. But it appears after all, that there was no evidence of the insanity of young Norcross, excepting that McKinney told Mr. McMaster that he was subject to fits of insanity; that he (McMaster) need not be surprised if he heard a noise in their room at night, as Norcross sometimes got up, and that he tried to destroy himself during those fits. Mr. McMaster and others at the Eagle Hotel never saw any positive signs of insanity with Norcross, but he was remarkable for his eccentricities. He paid the Hotel bills of himself and McKinney, and the clerk saw in his possession at the time two twenty dollar gold pieces, and other money. The citizens of Altoona are generally excited in consequence of the murder, and offer a reward of five hundred dollars for the arrest of McKinney. All the circumstances connected with the bloody tragedy, point to McKinney as the murderer. His story as to the insanity of the deceased, the cutting of the throat, the finding of the razor, twenty dollars and watch, were no doubt part of a deeply laid but fortunately unsuccessful scheme to ward off suspicion. But "murder will out" and McKinney like the first murderer fled. The club was there to give the lie to the razor, and the missing gold (notwithstanding the twenty dollars and silver watch which remained,) explains the motives which induced the perpetrator of the horrible and atrocious deed.—Pitts. Chronicle.
