If he finds himself contrary to his expectations, now engaged with one of that enemy he has not right to call upon Democracy to leave its own intrenched and well fortified camp and to run to any new position outside of the Democratic lines, and to come and extend to him relief and protection. The Democratic party is under no such obligation to any of its truant sons. Let them come home from their wanderings. If enemies assail them, let them return within the Democratic encamp ment, and then they shall be protected by her battlements and towers.
