Astonishingly great as the earth appears, when viewed correctly and in comparison with objects upon its surface, it can, however, be made to appear, that, when compared to the universe, it is but -a mere atom of the creation. It might seem to -the superficial observer, and no doubt is believed by many, that the sun, moon and stars, were created merely to garnish the heavens, to answer the purpose of giving light to this earth; and that their anagnitude, compared to the size of the globe, is vENS is among the ablest men in Pennsyl- Without committing heresy upon the im- that the voice of the speaker was lost in the very inconsiderable. Vast, however, as the solar system appears, when compared with the earth, it is but a solitary one out of many millions of such systems -for the fixed stars are now known to be centres of other systems, as the sun is to that of which our earth forms a part. How infinitely small, then, is this earth, viewed in this connection, which to us seems so stupendous, when measured in a scale of comparison such as we use!

Some, no doubt, feel disposed to ask, how this knowledge of the motions, size and distances of the heavenly bodies is obtained, and how these comparisons are so confidently made? We have no hesitation in saying, that we believe that a great majority of mankind look upon such state. ments, as conjectural and uncertain.
