Original Poetry.

For the Potter Journal. WATCHING.

We stood, that quiet summer hour,
- And listened to the breeze That, with a thousand pleasant tones, Moved through the harp-like trees. Our spirits sweet communion held,

Her hand lay in my own, as light As sunshine on the hill. I blessed her for her love and said: "The sun shone not for me Thro' the long hours when thou wast gone

I only thought of thee. "Thanks, that the Father's kindly hand Hath led thee back again : Thanks, that my prayers and ceaseless At last have fruitless been!"

I paused, and low she answered me. In trembling tones of pain: "I am a wearied watcher, too— My watch hath been in vain. Day after day the morning sun

Lights up an empty hall; Night after night the cloud of woe Across my heart must fall; And hourly o'er my buried hopes The ghost-like shadows pass

Whose dark feet never stir the flowers, Or tuited plumes of grass. "Eva! we all are watchers here, The best can only take

And wait until the morning break. Between the leaves the moonbeams fell Upon her face, so white,-I thought of other flowers, as fair, Long solded from my sight.

From the light birch's hair, The rain drips o'er a little mound With Spring's first mosses fair. Besslef I miss thee from the slope Where first the sunbeams wake ;-Tarry not long, beloved mine.

I am a watcher once again:
