Miscellany. Felected

From the Phiaselphia Press. PENNSYLVANIA.

Since the establishment of the Press me have seized every opportunity which we could snatch from editorial occupation to visit the interior of our grand old Commenwealth. Born in it, and disposedalike by natural attachment and taste to contracted in the construction of canals serve out our mortal term in it, and recently, moleover, by the providential disposition of circumstances, put into the closet and most permanent relations to its people, the whole current of our existence ects in the direction of its interests, honor, and happiness. Pennsyluania is our home, the home of our dearest friends; the home of our memory, and of all that remains of our hopes—the yery home of our heart; and we are concerned to justify, to our understanding, the instinctive judgment of our affections. The natural bias of strong feelings and absorbing interests must be allowed for, and largely $3); but still, the observation and reflections of every day strengthen the conviction that the coldest impartiality of judgment abundantly justifies all our pride in fir native State?

In this enterprise of internal improve ment, neither monutain chains, river courses, nor the ragged defiles of the nu-merous ridges which roughen the surface of the State, have hindered a successful achievment, and the interest of the debt and railways, large as it is, is ever promptly met by the State treasury.

But we are running into statistics, character, natural and moral, of the State and its people, and it is best to close this hastily scribbled leaf of what threatens to be an editorial treatise upon a subject which demands the talent and time of a dozen variously qualified authors, and for which we have scarcely any fitness except such impressions and impulses as spur the crude and undigested knowledge lacking, as is usual with the most familiar experiences, the system and the logic required for presentment and demonstration. We may again resume our subject .cessarily fall below the requirements of our theme.
