Delighted, heard thy infant lays, Has now descended from above And capplit thee in his arm of lever We miss thee now: thy agile form, Thy voice so sweet at eve, at morn; Thy prattle, and thy gleeful play, That did begaile and hours away.
And yet we would not ask thy stay, Though thou wert levely, blithe and gay Too pure for earth thy spirit shone, . And Christ has kindly called thee home. Who would not choose thus young to die To claim their kindred in the sky? Who would not leave this earthly dome With joy, to find the spirit's home? Oh blessed change ! from earth's unrest To happy sojourn with the bless. Oh priceless boon! Of God its given, To bear our spirits up to Heaven. In one of the cabine here (they are of split logs, chinked with this most execrable Virginia mud) apparently occupied by an officer there are backed campi chairs; bass candlesticks, crockery, &c., everything left in good order.

I had the horor of commanding an escort detailed for the purpose of taking some contrabands (captured last night inside out lines) to Gen'l French's head-quarters. One of there was quite intelligent; he represents the secesti as being extremely scared, they represented that they would fall back on the Raspahannock, and if the Yankees dared follow them they would there fix them. They have delighted in telling the slaves that the Yankees would kill them. Those in my though however, thought they would quite as soon risk themselves with the Fankees as with their former task-masters.

Little did we expect to arrive here with si unbroken company; we had expected fighting and hard fighting too. I for one am only too happy to have it without bloodsbed. I never saw ground so well adapted to defence; a small force determined to do hard fighting would slaughter an immense number before is could be taken.
