BESIDE THE DEAD.

Now I dare to scau thee boldly, Haughty, pallid brow! Thou hast ever met me coldly. Scarcely colder now: Something in thy bearing chilled me-Not a smile from thee enthrilled me,

Sadly passive brow. I might touch thee with my finger-Touch thy bloodless check, Yet no haughty flush would linger-But the thought is weak :

For thou liest dead before me, With the pitiless grave-chill o'er thee. Poor, white, frozen check!

In thy bosom's restless fever, Longings stole to thee;

But in all thy heart-throbs, never Leaped there one for me:

Yet, they say thy heart was tender, Melting in thine eyes of splendor-Could it-could it be?

Eyes of splendor !-- yes, I knew it,

But, for me, as cold As Heaveu's light, with snow-flakes thro' it Frem a cloud of gold.

Oh, those eyes for others barning. Met my own with scorn returning: Cold-ah me, how cold !

When they told me thou wert dying-Dying, young and fair-All my soul went out in sighing

One impassioned prayer: But the words shall not be spoken, For I know that no sweet token Beckoned for me there.

But thou liest dead before me,

Pale and voiceless one, With the shroud enfolded o'er thee. All thy scorning done:

Other hearts are madly breaking, And my own is proualy aching O'er thee, silent one.

It is my custom to make a few suggestions to teachers before commencing to examine a class, after which a printed list of questions in Orthogiaphy, Arithmetic, Geography and Grammar is placed before each applicant .---These questions are carefully prepared so as to embrace as much as possible of each branch in a small space. No question is so worded as to admit of a monosylabic yes or no as answer, but each suggest a principle or topic which is to be encidated, and much pains is taken to be employed a home than from study.
