ELLISE.

The pale and tender moonshine Lay on her forehead white, Silvered her soft brown tresses With its holy light; And the stars of Summer, With their twink'ling gleams-Was it their mellow radiance

That filled her eyes with dreams? The winds hummed softly o'er us In the Linden tree; Beneath whose dewy branches

Ellise stood with me! Ellise stood with me!

Bonnie little Ellise!—

The star-light and the shade,
Like a crown of blessings,

On her forehead laid!

Twas long ago, sweet Ellise! Thou'rt a woman now,— Thorns instead of Heaven-light, For thy pure white brow! But ever in my dreaming,

I see thee standing fair With the dewy star-light Twinkling in thy hair !

Is it a vision, only? Or, doth thy spirit go Back to that blessed Summer, From these years of woe? It is my Ellise, truly, Beneath the linden tree !--Her soul that, in the silence, Is keeping tryst with me!

THE MEETING.
