Original. THE BELLE OF BOLIVAR! A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

BY ONE WHO WAS THAR!

It was a beautiful evening at the close of one of Virginia's loveliest days, that I started ont to take a walk over the heights and thro' the vallies of Bolivar, near Harper's Ferry, Va. The sun, as if taking a good-night peep from behind the beautifully colored veil of mist and smoke that lingued about the western horizon, had scarrely reached the dimly visible summit of the distant range of the Alleghenics. The beautiful shades of evening were deepening in the lowlands and vallies and slowly creeping up their slopes to the summit of the mighty hims that seem to stand silent but sturdy sentinels over the bearde and quiet that sarrounds them. The ballow evening breeze of a sultry Southern clime, as at floated gently among the leaves and flowers of the Locust, the Rose and the Myrtle, woke but a gentle whisper of Nature's beauty, so near allied to silence that none but the thoughtful spirit, seeking communion the thoughtful spirit, seeking communion with Nature could distinguish it. ### OBITUARY.

In the spring of eighteer sixy-four, George Luce, my brother dear, He left his home for the battle-field Which brought forth many a tear. He was my parents' joy and pride-

He was their only son. But oh, alas I my brother dear, Thy days on earth are done. I've not forgot our childhood years, And never shall forgot Each winding path thro' fields and groves,

Methinks I see them yet. But, oh! my brother dear is gone-He is among the dead; His feet no more these winding paths Of dhildhood's days will tread:

No more he feels a sister's kiss Imprinted on his check,
Or listens to those dear, kind words
Our mother's lips would speak.

No sound now penetrates thine car, Within thy narrow bed

There is no need of gentle words
To soothe the aching head. Thy grave is far away, brother, I do not know the spot; Yet while I live, never by me

Shalt thou, brother, be forgot. Thy parent's hearts were bowed with grie When they heard that you were dead, To think no kindred friends were there To watch thy dying bod.

Well, brother dear, sweet be thy sleep, The past be all forgiven; And since we cannot meet on earth Ob, may we meet in Heaven. MRS. JULIA A. CONE, Alpine, N. Y.
