MISSING.

Boom! boom! boom! 'Twas the sullen signal-gun And through the early morning gloom to pealed like the trump of a dreadful doom And the tired sleeper woke with a start, And wondered what should be his part In the tragedy that must soon begin; Whether the Right should lose or win, [done. And where he should be when the day was

But his reverie could not last: "Fall in! fall in!" was the cry; And with one thought of the happy past, One glance that was suddenly, lovingly cast At a picture that nestled close to his beart, A glance that made the warm tears start, One breathing of prayer, one cheery word To the mustering ranks, he grasped his sword And sprung to the front to do or die.

Then a hundred cannon roared, And a hundred bugles blared, And over the ramparts the heroes poured With bayonet fixed and flashing sword; And across the plain, where the storm of death Came sweeping down with its fiery breath, And up the hill, where the surly foe Like an ambushed lion was crouching low, they dared.

His voice was steady and clear, His heart was cheerful and strong In his face there lingered no line of feat, The fire in his eye had dried the tear. And cheerily rung his word of command As he shouted back to his gallant band. They were falling fast, but he did not quail, And stendily up, through the leaden hail, He led his confident braves along.

Right up to the rampart grim Where the Rebel flag was floating; Right up to the awful crater's rim The sturdy veterans followed him. Forward! boys forward!" they heard him cry Then a blast of death went howling by, And when it had passed he was lying still And his braves were staggering down the hill And the air was rent with the rebel shouting

Is he lying silently now Alas! God knoweth what is best; But better, far better, our poor hearts say, To pour out his life in the flery fray Than slowly to die in the loathsome cell Of a terrible Southern prison hell: God knoweth the best-to His will we bow
