THE RING OF POLYCARATES.

Up to his battlements he stands— And proudly looks along the lands— And proudly looks along the lands— And proudly looks along the lands—

A Sprig of Holly.

I'm getting old, I'm nearly sixty-five years old now, and not the man I was. Well, I must tell you a story I'll tell you how a sprig of holly once saved my life.

side glance around. "Sure father told me before he went to give you this."

"A few weeks ago the proprietors of the Adine Press, of New York, gave a dinner at which many of the literary men of the country were present."

"I will call it together in the morning," said the editor at the request.

"But she insisted, and declared it was the rule of the Inn that every customer should pay at once for all he had."

"Very well," she remarked. "Now I am satisfied. Come to the apartment where I was to sleep, and giving me a light key."

"It was a loft rather than a room, but of great size, and the furniture was not uncomfortable, and what pleased was that I was surprised to find a good fire burning."

"I had had a speech prepared for this occasion, I would rather address a single dinner party than any other assemblage in the world."

"I tell you, watching the clock and wondering what all this meant, when suddenly an irresistible impulse came upon me."

"I must all know what it is to be seized occasionally by some strong impulse to do a certain thing, trivial in itself, but so ample, to touch a particular spot in passing."

"Well, the impulse that came over me was to take out the sprig of holly which Nora O'Connell had fastened over the clock, and to replace it by a sprig of holly."

"I glanced, by the light of my pair of trousers, and saw the very thing for which I had been seeking."

"Over an old-fashioned worsted-work sampler—framed and glazed as some great work of art, and some of the most beautiful specimens of the kind I have ever seen."

"Taking this sprig, I withdrew the branch which was in the clock and placed the holly in its place."

"To this day I cannot tell why, but as I crept back to my bed, I experienced a strange feeling, as if some one had done some very odd and clever thing."

"Another hour might have passed away, and I was still lying awake, ruminating on the strange feeling which had come upon me."

"My suspicions did not long. He glanced at me from the clock of the door with a smile that made my blood run cold."

"I had no sooner opened my door than I was seized by a strong impulse to do a certain thing, trivial in itself, but so ample, to touch a particular spot in passing."

"I wish, Dennis dear," she said, casting a chute of a gentleman of culture like Mr. Stoddard; and I am glad to be able to sit with you bright company as this, and hope you will excuse further remarks from your truly—Yours,
