Down in the Meadow. A story by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe.

That morning at table Mr. Service had said to himself, "If I only was rich now."

There were days, long ago, when Mr. Pettis, old and trembling with paralysis, sat in his bed, and his wife, and his children, wept over their spendthrift.

The dock and catarrils could not get out of Jeddiah's field with all his care.

Extraordinary Powers of Memory. A story by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe.

In a Sidney newspaper, some time back, was a curious account of a trial which took place in the County Court of the State of New York.

Perhaps in mere point of geography, by the line of the Hudson river, but in point of fact the people are much nearer to us than it is.

It's None of My Business. A story by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe.

This was one of the golden sayings of Jeddiah Pettis. One day he thought so, at least, by the frequency and emphasis with which it fell from his lips.

Jeddiah was a rich man, and he was a good man, and he was a kind man, and he was a wise man.

At this point Mr. Pettis began to have a little trouble in his mind, and he was a little nervous, and he was a little restless.

Mr. Pettis, said Mr. Service, "I do not know how you can burden your mind with such a thing as this."

When the defendant's counsel arose for the examination and desired the witness to go with the story and finish it, the Chief Justice said to the witness, "You are not to be examined on this point."

USEFUL AND SUGGESTIVE. Sweet Corn. A story by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe.

This is especially an American vegetable, and whether it is served on the table roasted or boiled, or cut in and prepared in various ways, it is always a welcome dish.

But there are both children and old persons whose teeth are so imperfect that they cannot eat the corn from the cob without tearing off some whole kernels, which are not easily digested, and frequently cause disorder of the stomach.

Some ingenious person, however, has invented a "Yankee corn-cutter," it is a half cylinder of tin, with a handle bolted to the cob, and across it there is a strip of tin with projecting teeth, and above it is placed a stout cutter in a groove.

Boil a dozen ears of corn more than are needed for dinner, and while warm scrape off the husks, and wash the cobs, and put them in the refrigerator until morning.
