These two brothers were born and reared upon the spot where they died. They were partners in business. Andrew was never married, and always had his home with his brother. They lived and acted together in great harmony, sharing each other's joys and sorrows. In early life they both became members of the Centre Presbyterian church. Having lived together from childhood, together they died, both alike calmly and peacefully, with their hopes of a blissful immortality firmly fixed in the Lord Jesus Christ. In this dispensation of providence, the "little flock" of which they were a part has lost much. James was for about thirty years an elder, and in that capacity served the church with much acceptance. He was a man of modest virtue. He shrank from observation. His piety was most manifest at home, but his walk and conversation everywhere were such as become the Gospel of Christ. He leaves a very interesting family to mourn his loss-a widow and five children. Three of the children, together with their mother, are members of the Church. Of these, two are young men, who, it is fondly hoped, will take the places of those who have fallen, as pillars in the Church. Of James and Andrew Clark, it may be said, as it was of Saul and Jonathan, they "were lovely and pleasant companion of the Bath.,
The camp at Aldershott is in admirable order in their lives, and in their death they were not divided."

Mr. W. had been a consistent member of the Presbyterian church in this place for some years. He was a man of few words, but of deep-toned piety.
