Perhaps it is for cut glass ware, and then it is blown and worked up smoothly and deitly by hand. The large jars Eiso are blown rather than pressed. These fare are taken, by some strange attraction, on the ends of rods and thrust into the mouths of the "glory holes" till almost at the melting point again, when they are returned to the work-man, who gives them the final shaping touches. After they have been formed, all the glass, both pressed and blown, is placed in the annealing oven to tem-

In the finishing-room little grindstones are whirling in all directions. One man has a stand near him filled with all manner of the finer bottles for druggists. He seizes a glass stopper. fastens it on a kind of spindle and fits over it a kind of iron mould lined with fine emory. In this mould which is stationary, the stopper while rapidly, grinding its surface down true as a die.
