Children's Questions.

Show us the philosopher that a child cannot puzzle. We have never seen such a phenomenon. Roll all the wise-acres of the world into one, and the whys and wherefores of a schoolboy shall confound the combination. If when the Admirable Crichton traveled through Europe, affixing his challenges to the gates of colleges, the professors had pitted their six year olds against the prodigy, we warrant they would have proofing, we warrant they would have propounded problems beyond his skill to solve. The truth is, that it is much easier to answer a learned man than a child. Your philosophers understand well enough that there are matters concerning which all men are equally ignorant, and with commendable tact and prudence they steer clear of them. But children are bold and persistent queriests. They are not satisfied with evasive replies. They crossexamine with merciless perseverance, and sometimes drive the most profound to the refuge of "I don't know." But even that confession—so humiliating to at less prices than can be bought in the State examine with merciless perseverance, grown up wisdom—does not always si-lence the youthful searcher after knowledge. He is apt to think you ought to know, and to ask why you don't know. We really like to set a smart child on a pedant. It is astonishing how the little interlocutor will worry and badger the man of books. But it does him good. It teaches him how much he does not know. It is very foolish for any man to give himself airs on the score of acquirements which do not suffice to save him from being cornered and convicted of ignorance by a mere baby.
