The American Cooking Stove All articles of value and established reputation have their imitations. Manufacturers who have not the brains to invent or the enterprise to have not the brains to invent or the enterprise to establish a reputation for themselves, seek to appropriate the inventions and reputations of those who have. The American Cooking Stove, for instance, has obtained a world-wide reputation. Messrs. Shear, Packard & Co. have spent seven years in improving and perfecting this stove, till it is almost perfect as a stove, and they have spent large amounts in advertising and bringing its merits before the people. There have been numerous imitations of it, and they have been compelled to bring five suits against different parties for appropriating their patented impropement, all of which have resulted in their favor. The last phase of these imitations is one similar in design and almost an extions is one similar in design and almost an exact imitation of the name, only one letter left out.

These spurious imitations are sought to be palmed off upon the public as a genuine article. This is in violation of their rights; and they have commenced a suit to restrain the sale of these fraudulent articles; and they propose to prosecute all infringements and imitations till others cease from appropriating and imitating their improvements.
