Miscellancous Reading.

A QUAKER DETECTIVE:

BY JUDGE CLARK. We were five passengers in all; two ladies on the back seat, a middle-aged gentleman and a Quaker on the middle, and myself on the one in front. The two ladics might have been mother and daughter, aunt and niece, governess and charge, or might have sustained any other relationship which ted, and immediately offered to go and made it proper for two ladies to travel together unattended.

The middle-aged gentleman was sprightly and talkative. He soon struck up an acquaintance with the ladies, towards whom, in his zeal to do, he rather over did, the agreeable-bowing and smiling and chattering over his shoulder in a way painfully suggestive, at his time of life, of a "crick" in the neck. He was evidently a gray Lo thario.

The quaker were the uniform of hi ect, and confined his speech, as many parliamentarian would save his credit by doing to simple "yeas" and "nays." As for myself, I make it an invariable rule of the road to be merely a looker-on and listener. Towards evening, I was aroused from one of those reveries into which a young man, without being either a poet or 'Are you armed, sir ?"

'I am not,' I answered, astonished, no doubt visibly, at the question. I am sorry to hear it, he replied; for before reaching our next stoppingplace it will be several hours in the night, and we must pass over a portion of the road on which more than one robbery is reported to have been committed? The ladies turned pale, but the straner did his best to reassure them. "Not that I think there is the slight est danger at present," he resumed "only when one is responsible for the safety of ladies, you know, such a thing as a pistol in reach would materially add to one's confidence." "Your principles, my friend," and to make off dressing the Quaker, "I presume are as ping-place.

Even at that early hour, they found the Secretary at his post. The President pleaded the case of Colonel Scott, and not only requested that leave of absence should be given him, but that a steamer should be sent down the river expressly to bring up the body of his wife. 'Humanity, Mr. Stanton,' said the President, his homely face trans-figured with the glow of earnest, tender feeling, 'humanity should overrule considerations of policy, and even military necessity, in matters like this.'
The Sceretary was touched, and he said something of his regret at not having felt himself at liberty to grant Col.

Scott's request in the first place.

'No, no, Mr. Stanton,' said the President; 'you did right in adhering to your own rules; you are the right man for this place. If we had such a soft hearted old fool as I here, there would be no rules or regulations that the army of the country could depend upon.— But this is a peculiar case. Only think of that poor woman!

Of course the 'impossible' was ac complished. To the surprise of the Colonel, the President insisted on driving him to the navy yard, to see that the Secretary's order was carried out immediately; seeming to have a nervous fear that some obstacle might be thrown in the way of the pious expedition. He waited at the landing till all was ready, then charged the officers of the steamer to give every assistance and attention to his 'friend, Colonel Scott.' With him he shook hands warmly at parting, saying, 'God bless you, my dear fellow. I hope you will have no trouble in this sad affair-and Colonel, try and forget last night."

The next morning we took the train for Lake Superior. The country along this route, for twenty or thirty miles, is very low and swampy, and contains dense thickets of balsam, larch, pine and hemlock; but beyond this point the country is drier, and the soil becomes a pure sand, upon which scarcely any vegetation subsists except a few stunted pines, huckleberry bushes, and a peculiar kind of laurel. Beyond this sandy plain we came to a low range of mountains, which fired my soul with strange emotions, for I had not seen such lofty hills since a year ago, when I left the pine-clad mountains of Pennsylvania—that Switzerland of America. Nestled down among these hills, and surrounded with somber forests, is a beautiful lake about two miles wide.-Here one of our passengers an old trapper-got off with his gun and birch cance. He was going to hunt the fleetfooted deer, and the last we saw of him he was "paddling his fown canoe" across the lake. As we proceeded on our way, we saw immense boulders of granite, weighing many thousand tons, and it was evident to the observer that we were fast approaching the great fountain-head of the boulders of glacial times. The following adventure happened in Bath in the year 179,—and the lady who marrated it to the writer was (in those days) a young girl staying in the house. It was in the palmy days of Bath, when the now fallen city rivalled London in brilliancy, and dissipation, and when all the rich, the gay, and the high-born of England congregated there benevolence, and—a set of the most beautiful and matchless amethysts. bers. On retiring to her room, about four o'clock in the morning, she took off her jewels, laid them on the table and dismissing the weary maid, intended to put them away herself, but before doing so, knelt down, as usual, to her prayers. While engaged in her devotions it was a habit with her to look upward, as the face of Phœbus was generally her point of sight, as it were, and the object on which her eyes most easily rested. On this particular night, as usual, she raised her eyes to Phœbus. she see? Has he filled those dull sitk eyes with vital fire? Or is she dreaming? No. Possessed naturally with wonderful courage and calmness, she continued to move her lips as if in silent prayer, and never withdrew her gaze, and still the eyes looked down upon hers. The light of her candles shone distinctly on living orbs, and her good keen sight enabled her, after a cleverly managed scrutiny, to see that the tapestry-eyes of Phobus had been cut out, and that, with her door locked and every servant in bed in their distant apartments, and all her iewels spread out before her, she was not alone in her room. She silently concluded her prayer with her face sunk down in her hands.

We can well imagine what those prayers must have been. She knew there was some one behind the tapestry; bed as usual and waited for the issue. her only omission being that she did not put her jewelry away. 'They may save my life,' she said to herself, as she closed her eyes. The clock struck five before a sound was heard, and the moment arrived. She heard a rustle, a descent from behind the tapestry, and a man stood at her-dressing table. He took off his coat, and one by one secured the jewels beneath his waistcoat. What would be his next move? Would it be to the bedside, or to the window? He turned and approached the bedside, idence she had just been craving. The At seven in the morning she rang her bell, and ordered the carriage round immediately after breakfast. All this was according to her usual liabits. On the box was the man who had cost her a night's rest, and most probably all her ewelry. However, she drove off; she went straight to the house of a magistrate. 'Seize my coachman,' she said; secure him and search him. I have een robbed, and I hardly think he has had time to disencumber himself of the jewels he has taken from me.?
