Public Ledger Almanac.—Geo. W. Childs of the Philadelphia Ledger presents ad his subscribers with a copy of his very valuable Almanac, in place of the Carrier's address, New Years. This involves an expense of several thousand dollars, and displays a liberality not often indulged. It is the first copy issued, and he proposes to keep it up from year to year. It is a valuable book of reference, and contains many items of interest not often found in Almanacs. He has our thanks for a copy.

TRIBUNE ALMANAC .- This indispensiible little annual is on our table. It is a collection of facts, figures, current history, and information in regard to our own, and foreign governments, which makes it invaluable as a book of reference.' She appeared upon the stage of the Opera House, attended by two elderly members of the Y. M. C. One of them announced the concluding locture of the course, soon to follow, and who would insist upon reciting from memory, only to correct himself, from the sorip in his hand, and would persist in calling Captain Hall "Sir," and Sir John Franklin, "Captain." He then introduced Miss Fields to the audience. She threw off wrappings and stepped forward, revenling a medium sized, rounded form, hazel eyed little woman, dressed in a stripped silk of the latest cut. She held in her hand a neatly bound copy of her lecture, to which she refered quite too often for effect. Her lecture was a rambling account of a late visit to the Adirondacks, of hunting, and fishing; stories by the camp fire, confabs with guides, hints to expectant tourists as to outfits and necessaries, including the usual "fish" story of a trout weighing thirty pounds, who engaged in the fur business; closing with a percration on the John Brown family.
