Read of his biplane was a German Taube which Beachey had chosen to fly, instead of his biplane which he had used obliving that with it he could make a vertical flight, or going straight up, when the monoplane seemed to quiver for an instant after he had pointed its nose upward and there was a flash of flame.

It was plain that Beachey had not lost his nerve, as the machine suddenly rolled over and headed for the flay. But was beyond human control and dropped like a shot into the water between the transports Logan and Crook, lying at the Fort Mason piers of the government. Strapped in the aluminum body so he could fly upside down, Beachey was craft of small wing surface.

Recovering the Body

There was a rush of small boats to the spot where the craft went down and a small piece of wood from the frame soon came to the surface. Volunteers from the crew of the battle-ship Oregon, including several divers, and put off in a launch and were soon on the spot.

Joseph Maerz, one of the divers, signalled for lines half an hour after he had gone down. He lashed them to the craft and the bluejackets drew it to the surface bearing Beachey's body. When the tail was out of the water a heavy line was attached to a donkey engine on the transport Crook and the machine lifted clear of the water.

Most Daring American Aviator

Lincoln Beachey was regarded as one of the most skilful and daring of American aviators. He earned this reputation long before the French flyers, headed by Pegoud, began to glide through the air upside down. Beachey was in retirement when these feats were heralded, and was drawn back into the game by his desire to exceed the remarkable flying of the Frenchmen.

With an aeroplane of small swing surface Beachey flew upside down, made spirals head-downward and looped the loop.

"This is a little railroad with twenty-eight miles of line. It makes the only transportation service through a country with about 2,500 popularoad, either passengers or freight. In road, either passengers or freight. In fact, there are only two or three trains a day, each of which carries one passenger coach and as many freight cars as the train requires. It is the rarest thing to see a train of ten cars. The average train consists of two to five cars. "Under the law each train, even "Under the law each train, even if made up of only four ears, must carry a crew of five men—two on the engine and three on the train. This also holds if there are only two cars, which some times happens, when one of them carries freight, for the law provides that no railroad can 'operate over its road any freight train consisting of less than thirty freight or other cars with a train crew consisting of less than five persons.' The farmer owners of this little railroad calculate that the wages of a train crew of five men almost equal the average earnings of three cars."

This railroad is not altogether operated at a loss but practically so. Economies that must be practised by the management in lines, other than manning trains, would suggest to the average reader that there is little, if any, momey left for the upkeep, to say nothing of taxes, and dividends for the investors. The farmer owners of this railroad, undoubtedly are suffering from the evils of the full crew law.
