offense and were every crime punishable by death or life imprisonment, there would be small need of an identification bureau," said Chief Hutchison, "but every criminal is not caught and the majority that are get free again, after serving time, and most of them begin again to ply their crooked trades.

"For example, a criminal is arrested, measured and photographed in accordance with the Bertillon system and his record placed on file. At some time this man regains his liberty and commits another crime. You look up your record and duplicate photo all over the country, and not only the police of the different cities are enabled to aid in the search, but the public as well, because a general description of the man and his photo can be printed in the newspapers."

Value of the Bureau Here

bureau was opened in Harrisburg thirteen years ago by the purchase of measuring tools and cards for the Bertillon, and how later it was developed by the purchase of a cabinet and finger print outfit. Now, he said, Harrisburg has a bureau of identification equal to any in the country. "The money value to Harrisburg can hardly be estimated," added the chief.

City Detective Ibach, in charge of the Bertillon system here, who transferred his card cabinets to the platform in the convention hall, demonstrated to the policemen that the complete criminal record of a suspect, together with a full description of him, could be obtained almost in an instant, no matter what alias the criminal was known to have used.

ed along the rest of the river bank. This was the original plan but it had been objected to.

Objection had been raised to this plan because it closes the wharf used by contractors who get coal from the river and for years have been using the landing. They have even threatened to take the city into court to obtain an injunction restraining the city from closing the gap in a way to eliminate the wharf. Similar threats were made by contractors when a perpendicular wall was proposed for closing the gap.
