Because she had never learned to draw a fowl and dreaded the process.

This condition of affairs is not uncommon; many women would prefer any other work to that of dressing poultry, yet the task is not so unpleasant if correctly done.

Julia stood upright. In her sever riding dress, she was as siender as a boy. She remained looking toward the horizon, immovable, patient, a silent watcher over the uncommunicative

"Perhaps," she thought, "there is nothing really beyond that line, so fast blotting itself into night—and yet I seem to see them come!" Madame de la Maine, in the door of her tent, immovable, her hands clasped around her knees, look affectionately at the young girl before her Julia was a delight to her. She was carried away by her, by her frank simplicity, and drawn to her warm and generous heart. Madame de la Maine had her own story. She wondered thrown everything aside and stood out

Julia, standing before her, a dark slim figure in the night—isolated and alone—recalled the figurehead of a ship, its face toward heaven, pionee ing the open seas.

Julia watched, indeed. On the desert there is the brilliant day, a passionate glow, and the nightfall. They passed the nights sometimes listening for that should hail an approaching caravan, sometimes hearing the wild cry of the hyenas, or of a passing vul-ture on his horrid flight. Otherwise, until the camp stirred with the daw and the early prayer-call sounded "Allah! Allah! Akbar!" into the stillness, they were wrapped in complete

In the deep impenetrable silence she seemed to hear her future speak to her. She believed that it would either be a wonderfully happy one, or a hope lessly withered life.
"Julia, I cannot ride any farther!"

exclaimed the comtesse.

She was an excellent horsewoman and had ridden all her life, but her riding of late had consisted of a canter in the Bois de Boulogne at noon, and it was sometimes hard to follow Julia's tireless gallops toward an everdisappearing goal.

"Forgive me," said Miss Redmond, and brought her horse up to her

It was the cool of the day, of the fourteenth day since Tremont had left Algiers and the seventh day of Julia's excursion. A fresh wind blew from the west, lifting their veils from their helmets and bringing the fragrance of the mimosa into whose scanty forest they had ridden. The sky paled to-ward sunset, and the evening star, second in glory only to the moon, hung over the west.

They halted their horses, looking over toward the western horizon and its mystery. "The star shines over their caravan," mused Madame de la Maine (Julia had not thought Therese poetical), "as though to lead them home."

Madame de la Maine turned her face and Julia saw tears in her eyes. The Frenchwoman's control was usually perfect, she treated most things with mocking gayety. The bright softness of her eyes touched Julia.

"Therese!" exclaimed the Ameri-"Therese!" Exclaimed the American girl. "It is only fourteen days!"
Madame de la Maine laughed. There was a break in her voice. "Only fourteen days," she repeated, "and any teen days," she repeated, "and any
