How Pennsylvania Will Vote.

A TALK WITH GOVERNOR HOYT—THE EFFECT OF THE INSTRUCTIONS TO DELEGATES.

Governor Hoyt, of Pennsylvania, was found last evening by a Tribune representative among a group of Colorado silver mine operators at the St. James Hotel. "I am not in New York to talk politics," he said. "It's silver that brings me here."

"I see you are quoted in a Pennsylvania paper," said the reporter, "as saying that the unit rule is not binding upon the district delegates to a National Convention. Is that your view?"

"Oh, well, I was chatting with my neighbors at homelast Saturday and a reporter printed a part of the talk in the Sunday paper. I did not suppose I was talking for the public. As to the unit rule and instructions adopted by a State Convention, I have always held that they were binding only on delegates at-large. I took that position in the National Convention when I was delegate. At Cincinnati in 1876 I was a delegate-at large. The other three delegates opposed me on two or three questions, and, of course, I acquiesced, because as a delegate-at-large I held myself to be bound by the unit rule adopted by our State Convention. The district delegates, though getting their credentials from the State Convention, are, I have always believed, free to vote in the way which they think will represent the views of their constituents."

"Was this the understanding of any of the men who voted at Harrisburg for the Grant instructions?"

"I have no doubt it was. The movement for instructions and the unit rule was so transparent that everybody saw through it to the real contest, which was for leadership. I think the Convention did right, under the circumstances, in taking the course it took. But there were plenty of men who voted for the instructions in opposition to their own convictions and the wishes of their people at home because they believed they would amount to nothing so far as tying up the delegation was concerned."

"What will be the practical result of this view, which you say is prevalent in Pennsylvania? How will your delegates vote at Chicago?"

"I imagine that the district delegates will feel bound to represent the views of their constituents as manifested in June rather than the views of a State Convention held in February. It will be the same thing, with your New York delegation, too. There may be men who will take the risk of voting their own preferences without regard to their constituents, but such men will be few unless their preference should lead them to the winning side. A delegate will hardly venture to vote against the home sentiment in his district, and vote at the same time for a candidate who is going to be beaten."

"Then you hold that a district delegate can vote as he pleases, no matter what resolutions the State Convention adopts?"

"The National Convention could make the Unit rule binding, I suppose. Otherwise it applies only to delegates-at-large."

"Do you think Grant will get the solid vote of Pennsylvania?"

"I am a Grant man myself and I think that if it is important that he should have the vote of Pennsylvania in the Convention he will get it—not as the result of the Harrisburg instructions and the unit rule, however. These instructions were not understood to have much significance as bearing upon the result at Chicago at the timethey were adopted. They were the weapons used to win the local fight for leadership."

Probably very few persons who are accustomed to purchase and wear the knit under-garments, technically and commonly called "mereno," know that fully one-half of all of the knit vests and drawers made in this country are manufactured exclusively from cotton, and that where any wool is used, it only forms a small proportion of the fabric. Manufacturers have bent their energies to making cotton goods look like woolen, and they have been so successful the wearers of those under-garments, in many cases have no idea that they are not woolen. It is said that as a majority of customers judge by the appearance of the articles, it is difficult to obtain any more money for woolen than for the cotton ones. At reliable shops the price will determine the material. The cotton under-wear is excellent for those who do not wish to wear woolen.

Shoes are made of leather in Europe, America and some other countries; of paper and various fabrics in China and Japan; of wood in Holland and France (sabots); of dressed skin among the Indians (moccasins). The Egyptians were shoemakers in the time of Joseph and Moses, and pictures in the tombs of Thebes and elsewhere, show the cobbler at his bench boring a leather sole with an awl. Mummies have often been found with shoes on their feet. The product of shoes manufactured by machinery in the United States is over $10,000,000 annually.
