

Temperance at the White House.

The quiet and uniform course pursued, the common sense evinced and the economy practiced by Mrs. Hayes during the four years occupancy of the White House have not only given that gay and festive dwelling a domestic and home like air, usually foreign to it, but secured for her the admiration of the best citizens of our land.

Whereas she had enough of the glitter and tinsel matter in her dress, habits manner &c., yet she carried out a creditable economy, practised a simplicity and evinced stamina and sterling worth, not in vogue under that roof for many years. But of all these shining qualities of head and heart for which she is famous, there is none standing in the prominence nor shining with the lustre that does the grand act of sweeping from the family board on all occasions the wine cup and champagne goblet. This was doubtless the crowning act of her life at the White House and though seemingly trifling and insignificant it has set a worthy example and marked an era in high life that will shine on, sending its benign and salutary rays through generations to come. Wholesale and retail dealers in the traffic in that city, acknowledge the potency of the act and confess a heavy falling off in sale and consumption of fancy and XXX brand goods, following her edict. The "Department of the Table" was the official position assigned her by the decision of the Electoral Commission that declared R. B. Hayes president, she holding her office by virtue of intimate relations to the President-elect. In this case no appointment was required nor confirmation of Senate needed. She slid in without influence of Bosses or Rings and received her commission and with it, the keys to the pantry, sideboard and wine cellar and a general superintendency of the domestic arrangement of the mansion. She was master of the situation and no power of Congress could impeach nor supersede her. If Rutherford wanted to extend the courtesies of the day to callers, friends or the Cabinet by proffering the customary glass, a veto to such hospitable acts by Mrs. Hayes flashed through his mind and ice water or lemonade was immediately substituted.

"When a woman will she will, And you can depend on it; When she won't she won't, And that is the end of it." A fact well known by our chief magistrate specially in the case of Mrs. H. before whose good sense and inflexible will he respectfully bowed. But to resume this article in a serious light, we say that this noble act has not only won for her enduring fame but a worthy example was set for her sex and incalculable good done for our nation and the world. Yet while we surround her head with a halo of renown and praise, we have no reason to doubt that her successor, Mrs. Garfield will exhibit and carry into practical use the same commendable taste, tact and sense and occupy as desirable a stand in the interest of temperance. The rumor that she has said she will not dictate the bill of fare of her husband's dinners we think has no foundation for we fail to see anything in her life or character to indicate a change of programme in the general routine of life at the Executive Mansion as inaugurated by Mrs. Hayes and we will guarantee the adoption of some temperance policy and an absence of wine at the family board.

"Revolutions never go backwards" nor will Mrs. Hayes' temperance reform, and in case any matron at that house ever try to annul or discard her honorable example, we pity them for the shower of rebuke and censure that awaits them from an indignant temperance element.
