The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says these pleasant words of the Senators from New York:

Senator Platt of New York impresses me well. I am glad of two points in him that are difficult to combine in one man. First, that he is strong in himself; second that he harmonizes with Mr. Conkling. I would be ashamed to rank among those zealous spirits who would like to see Mr. Conkling crushed. He is the greatest man in American politics to-day. And it is pleasant to note the fraternal way in which his new colleague goes and sits down by his side in the Senate chamber for long, close talks during dull speeches. Mr Conkling is dramatic even in tele-a-tele. It is born in him. He makes expressive gestures with his hands. His head nods gravely to emphasize his words. He is always an interesting figure to watch—dainty, well-groomed, pleasing to the eye. Father Time loves him in laying his slow hand upon him. His thinning blonde rings of hair show the splendid contour of his head better than did their old luxuriance and the gray that softly mingles with them somewhat spiritualizes that proud, reticent face. The wife of a Western Senator calls him "The American Endymion," but that doesn't more than half express him. He is a greater than Endymion's author. He is, as our school-readers said of Napoleon, "a sceptered hermit, wrapt in the solitude of his own originality."

When seated beside him Senator Platt is not dwarfed by the vicinage, which is a good test of the man. In his own way, a business way, he too is a force. His ability to comprehend and control intricate details is said to be truly wonderful. He holds three presidencies—of the United States Express Company, the Southern Central Railroad, and the Owego National Bank. Mrs. Platt, a large queenly-looking lady, is with him at the Arlington, and is an intimate friend of Mrs. James, wife of the Postmaster General. It is seldom that so handsome a woman graces Washington life, and at their home at Owego she is peculiarly esteemed and beloved. They will keep house next Winter.

The Philadelphia Press says there is seemingly, a general movement throughout the country, more or less distinctly marked in different localities, for an increase in the present rate of wages. In the iron business this took place a year ago, resulting in a decided advance in the rates paid to puddlers and rollers, but that by no means insures us against a repetition of the agitation in this same department of industry this year. The general increase in the cost of living and the large profits now reaped by employers not only justifies but necessitates a more liberal scale of remuneration to labor than obtained during the years of business depression. This has been recognized by many employers. Wages have in some instances been raised voluntarily and in others the demand of the workmen for an increase has been acceded to as soon as made. In some branches of industry a struggle will doubtless occur between employers and employed, which must result in great loss both to individuals and to the public, only to be compromised at last with dissatisfaction and hard feeling on both sides. It is evident that a demand for increased wages made on a rising market is pretty certain of success unless it is excessive. Trade unions, however, often defeat their own purpose by making their demands unreasonably large and displaying a dictatorial spirit which invites opposition. Every rise in the selling price of manufactured articles by no means justifies an instantaneous demand for increased wages. Employers bear the loss of a temporary fall in prices as best they can and are entitled to such windfalls as may come in the way of sudden and transitory booms. Sliding scales make a happy provision for dividing profits and losses in these contingencies, but they are feasible in but a few branches of industry.
