Our edition to-day reaches 750 copies. Advertisers will make a note of this.

There seems to be a scarcity of good servant girls in this place and many families who desire such help are compelled "to do their own work." It is quite as economical but not so pleasant for the female members of the household.

The woman noticed in the REVIEW a few days since as being here in search a brother, turns out to be an imposter. She was arrested on Friday evening by officer BURNS, charged with stealing clothing from the family of Mr. CAMPBELL, where she had been entertained by the overseers of the poor. The woman had been provided with necessary wearing apparel by some of our benevolent ladies.

So far only three of the borough's guests have signified their intention to take up their abode in the new county house to-day. They will be escorted thither by the overseers of the poor. We have no doubt they will find their new home much more pleasant than they anticipate. The unfortunate, worthy poor will be treated with all the consideration and regard due their helpless condition.—Those who have subsisted at the public expense simply because too lazy and shiftless to earn a livelihood, will be compelled to labor or "get right out of there." St. Paul had such in mind when he said "if any man will not work neither shall he eat."

The Elmira Advertiser's city editor must be hard pushed for items, or else he has been grossly imposed upon by "those well-known citizens" of that city, who it is alleged recently visited this place. The following article copied from the Advertiser of yesterday is not only untrue but grossly absurd. If everybody was allowed to smoke on the bridge the structure would soon be in ashes. As a caution to such "lookers on in Venice" as the individuals referred to in the subjoined article, the County Commissioners have caused to be placed at either end of the bridge, in large letters, in conspicuous position, notice that smoking is not allowed there. The bulletins are so plain that even city swells ought to see them. When they do not heed the silent warning they are certain to fall into the hands of SENECA, the vigilant guardian. The Elmira gentlemen should remember the fable of the old man and the boys who were stealing his apples:

It is customary in hotel, depots and public places to post signs reading something like the following: "Gentlemen will not smoke here. All others must not." You can always coax a man with much less trouble than to attempt to drive him, and therefore when they see that sign, each one considers himself a gentleman, and therefore desists. Last week a term of court was held in Towanda, at which attended three well-known gentlemen of Elmira. As gentlemen sometimes will, these persons bethought themselves to take a stroll to settle their hotel breakfast and before the assembling of the morning session of the Court. As they walked they smoked, and smoking they walked upon the wooden bridge over the raging Susquehanna. Little recked they of the fate that was in store for them. Puffing their cigars, they gazed upon the beautiful landscapes of the hilly surroundings, mingling the smoke of fragrant Habanas with the misty haze of the morning air. Calmly walked they and rapturously commended

"Slave to no sect, who took no private road,
But looked through nature up to nature's God."
When they got off the bridge a person invited them to the office of a justice, where they were requested to leave a fine of five dollars each for violation of the ordinance forbidding smoking on the bridge, and this in spite of the fact that there was no sign on the structure for the guidance of the way farer. That seems to be a queer way of doing business, and we understand an appeal is to be taken.

It should be thoroughly understood that hereafter when any outside barbarians desire to go to Towanda they should leave their cigars on the sill of a fence post until they get back again, or else hire a small boy to ferry the terrible weapon of destruction across the river while they walk. It would not be asking anything unreasonable to suggest to the county authorities to put up a sign.
