The Action of the Senate.

For nearly two months the Democrats of the United States Senate have been engaged in a wanton career of filibustering to defeat the rule of the majority. Their course is unwarranted and indefensible. In essence and principle it is the same thing as an open repudiation of law or a revolutionary defiance of the authority of government.

The clear constitutional majority of the Senate named the committees. Its right to do so was undisputed. The same majority then attempted to name the officers and determine the order of business. Its right to do this was precisely the same as in the other; but at this stage the Democrats, who did not challenge the right of the majority to appoint the Committees, set out to resist the right of the majority to appoint the officers. Their own course in the first instance condemned their course in the second. In both cases the principle which justified the Republicans was that which lies at the foundation of free government. Without the rule of the majority there is no law and no organized liberty.

The majority was legitimately and honorably made. It represented the common interest of Republicanism and of Independent Democracy against the Southern Bourbons. The Republicans found General Mahone fighting the Bourbons in Virginia, refusing to act with them in the Senate, enforcing a fair ballot and an honest count and leading a liberal and progressive South. The logic of the situation produced the alliance, and made the majority, and when made it embodied two ideas—first, the policy of encouraging independence in the South; and, second, the title of the majority to rule without regard to the policy and principle behind it. The Republicans took their stand upon these two ideas—upon the second as a right, and upon the first as the motive—and they were entirely justified in making a battle for this position.

But through their factions and obstructive course the Democrats have been able to defeat any action. Meanwhile the whole executive business for which the session was called is at a halt; the President's nominations are untouched; and the question presents itself whether the unjustifiable Democratic filibustering shall be allowed to arrest all the work of the session. The Republicans have practically decided that it shall not, and that they will proceed to consider the President's nominations. They can do this without surrendering their position as to the right of the majority to rule. They will continue to assert it and to attempt to exercise it precisely as before. If the Democrats resist, the responsibility will be theirs. The Republicans are responsible for the rectitude of their position, and not for results; and when they maintain their undoubted right and at the same time couple with it action upon the President's nominations their attitude will be unassailable.

They are coming to this position with entire unanimity. The nominations over which there is no dispute will be speedily confirmed. The one which has been the chief cause of division will be allowed to rest for the present. And the delay thus far will have had the effect of cooling passions, repressing conflict and possibly of pointing the way to a satisfactory adjustment.—Press.

It is said that five hundred employes in the census office at Washington will soon be dismissed. The need of their services has almost ceased.
