The President has the support of nearly the entire press of the country, in the contest which has been forced upon him.

There is no more reprehensible practice among the young women of the present day than the use of cosmetics. These invariably contain poisonous ingredients which, when applied to the skin are certain to effect the health injuriously. Whatever they may seem to add temporarily to female beauty, is certain to be counterbalanced by impaired health, and perhaps death. Such a death has been reported within the past week. It is the latest of an innumerable line of similar cases. A custom so destructive, both of health and beauty, should have few advocates among American women, whose beauty requires no aid from such a dangerous ally.

The decimal system of coinage is by universal consent the simplest now in use in civilized nations. No less than five separate parliamentary committees have advocated its adoption by England during the past half century, but that progressive country has sturdily set itself against its adoption. Recently a member of Parliament offered a resolution proposing its adoption, but there was at once a tremendous outcry against the proposed innovation, and members declared that they would as soon think of abolishing the House of Lords or doing something equally dreadful, as to give up their pounds, shillings and pence. John Bull is more obstinately wedded to custom than any of the other members of the large family of nations.

The Political Situation.

We view with much alarm the intense, though suppressed feeling that now exists in the ranks of true Republicans. Alienations are being effected that will be difficult, if not impossible, to restore.

The Boston Traveller speaks sensibly in the following article:

It may be, we doubt not that it is, the fact, that Senator Conkling views the nomination of Judge Robertson with dislike. It may be that President Garfield is earnestly desirous of having Judge Robertson confirmed. They are both strictly within their rights in these contrary attitudes. But the Republican party has a right, if there is any talk of splitting its forces over this comparatively trivial divergence of views, to say that the occasion is not commensurate with the possible results. It has a right to insist, if need be, that Judge Robertson and the Collectorship of New York are not large enough bones of contention for a whole party to struggle over. It will, if it comes to that, declare that the Empire State must not be jeopardized in order that one man who is not and never has been Mr. Conkling's friend may be removed, and another man, who appears to be regarded as Mr. Conkling's bete noir, shall be put in his place. It will finally demand that, where no question of principle but a simple question of men is involved, there shall be a way out found that will spare the country the sorry spectacle of a great party going to pieces over a little office. The Republican party can get along very well without a Conkling man in the New York custom house, and so it can without having a Blaine man there. But it cannot get along at all without the imperial State of New York in the Republican column, and that necessitates harmony in the Republican ranks there. There is no split yet, and there must be no split, except such a splitting of the difference as will bring unity and peace all around.
