Rev. Edward Judson, Baptist, has terminated his pastorate over the largest and wealthiest congregation in Orange, N. J., resigning a salary of $5,000, to commence preaching in the down-town wards of New York city. He is ambitious to give the poorer classes as good preaching as the wealthy pay for. Mr. Judson has been exceptionally successful at Orange.

Mr. Judson says that he does this in accordance with the custom of the Master, who preached the gospel to the poor without money and without price, and as inonces have been few of ministers relinquishing large salaries to preach thus, he is ready to make one of the earliest sacrifices. Such an instance disarms, most effectually, the charge made by Rev. McLarren at a Cleveland convention, that the ministerial profession aimed to be the ministers of the rich to the neglect of the poor and clad themselves so daintily in kid gloves and patent leather boots, that they could not follow the Master into the highways and hedges and slums, to save souls.

There is more than the above care. Recently a rector of Brooklyn left a prosperous parish to enter the missionary field on our Western frontier. He has already lost his wife, to whom the change of climate was inhospitable. The moralist pauses to query whether two such notable instances shall prove merely exceptional, or are we to have a diversion from the high and rich congregations, to the slums, the streets, the gutters, the frontiers and the localities especially affected by the great Master? Is the doctrine of regeneration to be armed with a new power for giving the poor as well as the rich, the best preaching?

We might note a case nearer home. One of the most zealous and able ministers in this county recently left a large parish where he was receiving a remunerative salary, to take charge of a small and very poor Baptist church with a salary which barely affords him a livelihood and yet is abilities would command more than double the stipend he gets.
