City vs. Country.

Among the many peculiarities of mankind is the habit or custom of building cities and living in close proximity to one another. This trait has been characteristic of the human family from time immemorial; accounts of the building of cities being found in the first chapter of the Bible. In early times as well as the present, there were reasons for this corporate mode of life and among them may be mentioned the mutual protection of the inhabitants, the superior social advantages and religious privileges enjoyed and the surpassing business facilities afforded. Central points usually form a nucleus around which population gathers, the accessibility of the location drawing capital and enterprise building up the manufacturing industries and supporting the commercial interests and sustaining the various other branches of trade, including the professions, arts and pursuits that make up city life.

The best of these sites are found along a river valley, or at a good harbor on some large body of water. But since the introduction of railroads and the discovery of minerals, points not at all central, convenient or accessible often become a metropolis, where in the absence of the railroad enterprise or mining industry, it would have been a habitation for owls, woodchucks and hunters.

Statistics taken every ten years show that this cityward tendency is on the increase, especially as regards this country. In the year 1800 only one-twenty-fifth of our population dwelt in cities; every decade since shows an increase of the influx and to day about one-fourth of our people belong to these human bee-hives. This mania as evinced by our young people principally for an existence amid brick, humdrum and confusion has assumed a magnitude that demands our serious attention. The passion reveals a taste for fashion, ease, fast life, money and pleasure that results in the cities being over run, a surplus of labor, depressed wages and the consequent suffering and want and crime.

There is a fascination about city life with its pomp, show and dazzle as seen by the casual observer that allures the unsophisticated youth from the quiet and healthy country home to seek ease, honor and fortune where gas-lights sparkle and pavements ring to rattling busses. But it is not in the overflow of population, crowding our cities to suffocation, engendering disease, reducing wages, fostering crime and entailing misery, wherein lies all the evil of the situation. There are other evils and among them it may be mentioned that the development of the country is retarded. Agriculture, that great industry in which our chief and substantial wealth lies, is neglected and the general thrift and prosperity of the country materially impaired. But of late we are glad to note an improvement in the situation and see an effort put forth to right the error. The press has pointed out the evil and offered an easy solution to the problem. The surplus population is advised to seek the country and those in the several districts are warned not to migrate to the city, as the enterprise will without doubt be disastrous. As most of those who seek the city are from the rural districts, if they are bent on leaving the farm they had much better follow the advice of the late Horace Greeley and go west. It is now generally thought and hoped that the revised status of the farmers life, the independence and popularity given it by the use of improved machinery, thus giving an ease and dignity to what has been heretofore hard labor will tend to counteract the tide and hold the boys on the old homestead, happy prosperous and contented, thus working out and satisfactorily adjusting the difficult question in a manner by which mankind in the city and country will be materially benefitted.
