The following is a synopsis of the first lecture of the Institute course, delivered by the Rev. E. J. Morris, of Neath. The subject was "Learning, its Uses and Advantages."

Although all knowledge is learning, the lecturer restricted his use of the term to the old conservative culture which is represented by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge in England, and by the older colleges in America.

Children, almost as soon as they take up the study of any new language, or branch of knowledge, want to know what is the use of it. They do not spend their time without they can see some benefits arising from their efforts. Parents do not like to spend money upon their children's education with out they can see immediate results. The reason that they are not oftener satisfied is that the children have not gone deep enough, and the parents can not see for enough. They expect benefits in kind. They think that learning ought to give wealth, glory, and honor. But if, by deep learning and culture, they expect riches, they are mistaken. The man of culture and deep learning is hardly ever a successful business man. If you want riches only, do not seek to be learned.

If they think that deep learning is necessary to give them glory, they are again deceived. The man of small learning who uses large words and obscure phrases, gets more praise than the more learned, but less pretentious one. Learned men are not often the recipients of high political honors. Garfield was an exception to this rule. It is the ignorance of others and not the learning of the man himself, which gives him reputation. Unless all others are educated to his own standard, they can not appreciate his learning. If you want glory do not spend time in acquiring real knowledge since the sham will do better. But learning contributes to enjoyment, and though enjoyment is not the end of life a certain portion of it is necessary to make a complete man. As the child, at first, finds enjoyment only in carrying everything to his mouth, yet after awhile learns to take pleasure in sight alone, so man uneducated, can only find enjoyment in possession; but by learning, one is enabled to enjoy the possessions of another by sight and without covetousness.

By books at your own fireside, you may become better acquainted with foreign lands than your unlettered friend can by years of actual travel. If you lack society you have treasures of thought from the whole world spread open before you; and the ideas which you there obtain belong to you as much as to their first recorders.

Many so called scientists wish to set up the claims of scientific culture against the claims of the older learning, saying that as a civilized science has done more for mankind than the other. They do not see that the one civilizes only in respect to our material wants, that the other civilizes the soul. The ancient Greeks and Romans were just as civilized in this respect as are scholars of the present day. We cannot call Aristotle, Plato, Socrates, Thucydides or Tacitus, uncivilized. Not that the claims of science should be denied, but they should not be allowed to overturn the other. The two should stand side by side.

In politics learning is accounted of little worth. To succeed in politics a man need have common sense and a good knowledge of human nature only. Learning is considered superfluous. However, no one's common sense is injured by a little help from the common sense of others. A man's full powers can be exerted only after they have been cultivated by scholarship. The learned man is more true to his principles; he will not compromise his theories for the sake of power. Two conspicuous examples are Garfield and Gladstone. Garfield was cut off in the beginning of his career, but Gladstone has had a long era. He was raised to power by a large majority which soon melted away when he refused to sacrifice his principles to party necessity. Again raised to authority by another majority, his support is now slipping away again for the same cause. But his greatness still remains.

In religion, learning better enables us to comprehend the scriptural teachings and to separate the oriental characteristics of the bible from the revealed word of God.

Many vital questions are unsettled by the majority and will so remain until culture is more general. These points can only be settled by those having this particular knowledge. Finally we should so live and acquire learning that we may be prepared to depart with the falling shadows. G. B. T.
