UTILIZING THE POPPLE.

Additional Study to Be Given the Tree by the Government Forest Service.

The northern poplar, or popple, of the northeastern states, is coming in for increasing study by the forester and lumberman. Not very long ago the wood of the popple was used only for excelsior. Some two or three years ago the pulp manufacturer added it to his list of species supplying his mill, and it is now generally and increasingly used for paper pulp of certain grades throughout the northeastern states. It is a very rapid growing tree, with a pronounced tendency to extend itself on old fields, so that a considerable area of unwooded land, cut-over lands and burned areas are coming up to a growth of popple which will figure importantly in the lumbering problems of the regions in which it occurs.

The forest service has received a large number of applications for advice relative to the management of forest lands containing stands of popple and in consequence is making a detailed commercial study of the several species, with special attention to the production, growth rate, market value and quality for pulp and excelsior use of each. In addition, the study will keep in view possible fresh uses for the popple, and ways of preventing the injury of popple stands from fire.

It is highly probable that working plans for future forest management in New York and New England will take increasing note of popple.

PARROT SWORE IN SPANISH

Bird's New Owner Didn't Understand the Language and Was Laughed At.

A party of tourists arrived over the Mexican railway a few days ago after having visited a number of the cities in the hot country, relates the Mexican Herald. The various members had picked up a number of curious on their trip, and among them was a parrot. None of the tourists understood Spanish, and this accounts for the fact that the ladies were not blushing as they passed out of the depot with the parrot swearing to a nicety in choice Spanish expressions.

The party was driven to a hotel and the parrot began with his favorite line of sentences: The clerk and the people around the office who understood Spanish were horrified to hear some of the worst words known to the Spanish language blurted out. "I beg your pardon," said the clerk, "but your parrot is using some very bad language and we will have to insist that you remove him from the office at once."

"Bad language!" exclaimed the lady who had carried the cage from the tropic. "Does he use bad language? Well, that accounts for so many people laughing at me."

The parrot was hastily removed from the room and within an hour a caged parrot called and carried it out by the back way.
