A French paper of Constantinople.
Phare du Bosphore, reports the tragic death of a Greek, Georgio Antikulos, who had for years the hallucination that he was the reincarnation of an Egyptian priest of the Temple of Isis.

M. Antikulos was a retired banker While under the hallucination he built in the neighborhood of Svordin, near Salonika, a temple dedicated to the Egyptian goddess, to which he retired and lived the life of a hermi, only appearing in the village at rare intervals The Ladies' Aid society of the | Egyptian priest of the Temple of Isis. pearing in the village at rare intervals to purchase food.

In imitation of the ancient Egyptian city of Bubastis he also built near his dwelling a park-like inclosure in which he kept a large number of cats, which he treated with reverence, offering incense in their honor, and expending large sums of money on their food.

A few days ago the hermit was found dead in his cell at the foot of a shrine, surrounded by the half-burned bodies

ROAD LINKED WITH HISTORY Origin of the Natchez Trace, Famous

Highway of the South-

One of the oldest roads in the country is the Natchez Trace, of which John Swain in Everybody's Magazine writes as follows:

"A hundred years ago the eyes of America were on the southwest. We were on the edge of a war with Spain over the closing of the Mississippi; and under orders from Washington, Wilkinson, in command of Fort Adams, held some solemn conclave with the Indians who owned the east bank of the big river, and by treaty established a sacred postroad through their country. It left Nashville in the old Buffalo trace, crossed the Tennessee at Colbert's ferry below the Mus-sel shoals, and striking the bills back of the Rig Black, came down to Natchez and on to New Orleans, with a branch to the Walnut hills. The road was more than a military neces sity, for so many pirates infested the Mississippi that merchants returning from New Orleans needed a safer route home with their money. "After it was opened it became all things in the southwest. Methodism went down that way in the person of Thomas Gibson; later, Lorenzo Dov followed him with the camp-meeting spirit. Old Hickory marched his army down to Natchez over this route in 1813, and marched it back again next spring. And from that day till nearly our own it has been the great cente of that country's activity. Now the railroads have come, the settlers have moved down into the valleys, and opened up poorer roads in the beds of branches and through swampy low lands. But the trace is still there up on its ridges, the best road of them

The president, while out driving one "Good morning. Uncle Jake," said "Good morning, sah," responded

"which would you rather have this Miss Nellie Carl of Towarda and of whisky?"

Then a happy thought struck Mr. Roosevelt. "Uncle Jake," he said.
