Submarine Logging.
The wastefulness of the early lumbermen in the west is the opportunity of the enterprising lumbermen of today. A company was incorporated last summer to engage in submarine logging in various rivers of Michigan. It was announced lately that from a deep hole in the bend of one river a scow equipped with a crane had fished out 200,000 feet of lumber. The Minister river is said to be paved with logs of pine, elm, cherry, oak and maple for a distance of 200 miles. These logs sank instead of floating down stream along with the main body of the cut when they were first rolled into the water. Not only are logs being fished from the river, but slabs are being dredged from the bottom of Muskegon Lake, where they were sunk years ago because they had no market value. They are saved up into laths now and sold at a profit.

MEMOIRS OF A CHICKEN.

My first acquaintance with Muhammad Din was one evening in the early fall. His mother, comparatively unsuccessful in her second attempt at incubation, had tired of maternal duties on a small scale and piloted her small family to one of the roosting houses where, on my rounds, I found a peculiar situation.

The chicks had all sought their quarters for the night except one. It was little Muhammad, and there he stood, a fluffy black ball, lonesome, uncertain in the gathering twilight, and pouring the tumult of his little soul into measures of the most exquisite melancholy and abandonment that I had ever heard.

Taking up the hopeless little outcast, I tried as best I could to comfort his aching heart. He was appreciative of my efforts and responded with cheery peeps of trust and confidence as he nestled in my hand, and chirruped a dreamy good-night when I finally left him in his cozy quarters.

I thought little more about it until the next evening, when I found that my little protegee had by no means forgotten his delightful experience and wished it repeated; for he did not follow his foster brothers and sisters to their wooden roost, but again raised his doleful chorus, which I quieted by again putting him safely to rest. And so it grew into a habit with both of us. Every evening Muhammad would linger until the rest had retired and then raise his entreating cries, while I, listening, would hasten and put the little pariah to rest.

And thus the friendship between Muhammad Din and myself ripened. It was about this time that I honored my little friend with his foreign sounding name, for in some respects, at least, he seemed to resemble Mr. Kipling's wise little Hindu.

I had now become able to distinguish Muhammad clearly from his fellows and it pleased me to see that he excelled them all in deference and attention to me. Yet as the days passed on I could not help seeing as the chicks feathered and increased in size and stature that my little friend was not holding his own.

Noticing more closely I found the reason. While the others were working, vigorously scratching in the litter for the hidden grain, Muhammad was for more likely to be reflectively looking on than to be engaged in the eager competition.

At intervals I placed little Muhammad in the grainroom and allowed him to eat to repletion, but this, while satisfying his hunger, seemed to produce no marked growth, and he fell more and more behind.

At length the chicks outgrew the brooder and it became necessary to find a new place for Muhammad. A convenient arrangement soon offered itself.

In one of the houses there were two young pullets who obstinately refused to roost.

At this time, however, this failing became a virtue. Muhammad was placed in the house and every evening he crawled under them for his night's rest, thus having his third maternal arrangement.

Winter was coming on now and kind nature supplied little Muhammad with a generous coat of dull, black feathers, which reached clear to his toes, and if not enhancing his beauty at any rate aided in making him comfortable.

No doubt many would have considered him an ugly little runt with utterly no excuse for living, and I admit that to thus keep him in contravention of all laws known or laws to be discovered for profitable poultry raising, but if such thoughts were ever present they instantly fled when I looked down at Muhammad's sagacious little eyes as he stood blinking at me and regarding me with the most sincere devotion and admiration.

Never do I hope to be favored with such love and affection. Every morning when I opened the house he ran to meet me, chirping a cheery good morning, and every time that I chanced to direct the day to be about the yard he would follow after me, chattering his good will and making his bravest efforts to light on my shoulder.

I was his hero, his benefactor, his protector. He was happy to even see me; he was in transports did I but pet him for a bit.

He now no longer made the slightest pretense of scratching for his food, and regularly every morning I placed the little glutton in the grain room, where he would stuff himself until he could hold no more, yet at evening he was ready again to engorge his little crop with the delicious mash and, turgid and happy, cheep under his protectors, chirruping and carolling his satisfaction.
