HIS MISSING GROWL

Henderson came to his Staten sland breakfast table so good-natured that his wife looked at him in a puzzled way and one of the children ask ed in a whisper if papa "was not feeling well this morning." The customary growl at the coffee was missing; the toast was just right and he complimented the eggs on their freshness. Noticing the look of siarm on the faces of the children he laughed heartily, chucked the little cherubs under the chin, gave them a dime an around and said to his better half: "My dear, it is going to be a remarkably light day at the office. I shall baly have to look in. Or, perhaps, I can just call them up by telephone and that will be enough. Suppose you come uptown with me-I shall take

"There is a man waiting for me in the office who has just arrived from Chi, cago to put through a big business deal." Then seeing the look that came into his wife's face he tried to assume his morning's good nature again, and said: "Never mind, dear, I will meet you at 2:30 o'clock, and will have luncheon together.

It was one o'clock when, tired, cross and as yet to doubt as to whether ne had succeeded in putting through the "deal," he got off a train at the trysting place.
