The Obsolete Man

By ALBERT E. HUNT.

"Good-by and good luck!" If there was a covert irony in the Warden's words it was not premeditated, and neither he nor his parting guest perceived it.

Ideals, in the common definition, the Warden had not, but in the ethical code of prison keepers he knew "what was right," and this man had approximated very near to it.

The little wicket in the monstrous studded doors of the prison closed silently and the man stood in the world again. It was early morning in summer, and the sun was sailing listlessly over from the east, with only a promise of the opulent splendor of his midday wakening.

Originally the penitentiary had been on the outskirts of the town, but now it was enveloped by rows of small dwelling-houses and cheap stores. Once it had worn a fittingly penal air of sequestration; now the sombre dignity of its great gray walls was flouted by the tawdry brick of these interloping neighbors.

There came to the free man a vague recognition that during the silent expanse of time which had widened—widened—on the other side of these walls the world here, only a step from them, had been ceaselessly whirling away, with all its wonted clamors and contentions, heedless as ever of the individual atom.

According to a Neuchatel correspondent, the watch factories in that town are extraordinarily busy, owing to a huge order for "War Watches" which has been received from the Japanese government. The watches are thin and of good finish, with oxidized metal cases, and are intended for presentation to the mikado's soldiers and sailors, as mementos of their successes in the war with Russia.

A small's rate of travel was ascertained by experiments in Florence. Half a dozen snails were permitted to crawl between two points ten feet apart. Exact time was kept from the start to the finish, and thus the average pace was learned. The figures were then put into tables of feet, yards and furlongs, and it was found that it would take a snail exactly 14 days to travel a mile.

A man's corpse was delivered to William Archer, of Cromwell, Ind., who went to the express office to get a prize pig which he had purchased. Archer refused to accept the coffin, and inquiry developed that the labels on the pig's box and the coffin had become exchanged.

In a small village in the south of Scotland an elder in the parish church was one day reproving an old woman, who was rather the worse for liquor, by saying: "Sarah, don't you know that you should fly from the tempter?"

Contrary to the general opinion the beaver does not always build a house for himself, being content very often with a burrow in the bank of the stream. As is the case with the house the entrance to a burrow is under water, though sometimes there is an opening from the surface through which brush and sticks are carried for their food supply.

A new floor when waxed must be left over night before polishing, but an old floor may be polished as soon as the wax has been applied all over it. A woolen rag may be used for this purpose, but the best thing is a weighted brush with a long handle.

The pastor paused in his discourse and looked over his congregation. "Sister Smith," he said, "will you kindly come up close to the pulpit? I can save my voice by repeating the rest of this sermon to you in a conversational tone, and it will not disturb the slumbers of the others."—Cleveland Leader.
