BERSAMO

Story of One Small Hospital Patient By GRACE LOIS RUARC

She waddled into the ward like a little fat goose, clinging to the visiting nurse with one hand and clutching a banana with the other.

She was only four years old, and alone among strangers, so she felt that she must be on the defensive. Her great black eyes peered out from beneath a tangled mop of hair and she threatened to burst into tears.

Her costume was striking, if not beautiful. In her dress her Syrian mother had expressed her love for color.

It took two nurses to address her and put her in her little crib. There she sat bolt upright, a veritable thunderbolt.

For two days she kept it up every waking moment. Then she suddenly became as silent as she had been noisy. She still sat up in bed, perfectly mute, scowling at every one, her eyes constantly shifting, watching every movement made in the room.

She looked like a caged animal. I wonder what she made of it all and what revenge her infantile mind was planning, for she had the most malignant expression imaginable.

Having an affection of the mouth, she was put on a liquid diet and how she hated it! Disgust was written on her face every time her food was brought in.

"What is it, Bersamo?" she asked. "Coffee," she exclaimed, excitedly. Overjoyed at hearing her speak after her long silence, the nurse went to get her some.

"Bah!" she screamed. Then, with a quick sweep of her hand, cup and coffee went crashing to the floor. After she had been with us a week her mother brought her brothers and sisters to see her.

First came a boy about seven, waddling in just as Bersamo had done, with his bright black eyes roving everywhere. He had on a pair of scarlet trousers reaching halfway between his knees and shoe tops, a pink silk shirt and pale blue tie.

Then came a girl about seven, waddling in just as Bersamo had done, with his bright black eyes roving everywhere. He had on a pair of scarlet trousers reaching halfway between his knees and shoe tops, a pink silk shirt and pale blue tie.
