SEE GRAFT IN SCHOOL FUND.

Local Board Said to Have Padded Lists to Increase Shares.

Harrisburg—Revelations which will show that certain school districts in the State have annually for several years secured thousands of dollars more in appropriations for the State Treasury than they were entitled to receive are expected to be made as the result of an investigation now going on. The method of "working" the Treasury is the alleged padding of the list of school children, on which the appropriation is partially based. It has been known for some time that many school boards turn in to the State a list of pupils far in excess of that made by the registry assessors of their districts. The duty of making the list of children of school age devolves by law on the assessors, but it is claimed that they do their work negligently. For this reason some school boards have had their own census made, and in many instances have added hundreds of names to the list.

This action on the part of school boards was winked at by the State authorities as long as it was believed that the school boards were only seeking to secure justice for their districts, but evidence is now coming to light showing positive fraud in the padding of some of these lists. This, it is believed, will furnish a good reason for the contemplated change in the basis of school appropriations whereby districts which have the longest school terms will have a proportionately large share in the State appropriation.

WHEN DOCTORS DISAGREE

In a previous article Dr. Rishel shows that though Dr. Cummings had expressed disfavor for laymen as not capable of considering the question of vaccination yet Herbert Spencer, Alexander von Humbolt, W. E. Gladstone and many others of the world's greatest scientists had opposed vaccination as a most harmful delusion. These men can not be disparaged. He also shows that both inoculation and vaccination as practiced in the western world were introduced by women. Also that vaccination is probably the introduction of a disease given to the cow by man. That the practice of vaccination was merely ADOPTED by the medical profession and that one of them, inoculation, had to be prohibited by law to stay the ravages of smallpox. He disclaims any animosity toward the medical profession and only sympathizes with them in the practice of their most difficult art.

Dr. Cummings has done a commendable thing in addressing his newspaper communications to the people in this valley. The people of this community have a right to know from both sides what argument can be brought to bear on this paramount subject. The anti-vaccinationist does not intend to keep quiet, and certainly he should not have the whole field to himself.

But does the doctor realize that he has inadvertently and perhaps unconsciously acknowledged that the layman's judgment can be appealed to on the subject? In the opinion of the greatest lawyers, no verdict is so good as the agreement of twelve men unlearned in the law. This ought to apply to this subject as well. Now that this question is settled we will be able to appeal to reason.

It seems necessary to say that the newspapers can not supply much space in any one issue and that what I have to say will not be much more than commenced in this article. Any one interested should preserve each paper until the discussion is ended.

The doctor's last published article indicates that he is finding the subject more complex than he at first stated it. In his recent but former article he announced four statements as to which he said: "If these statements are correct it surely proves the effectiveness of vaccination." Now he issues another challenge containing ten "statements" not at all identical with the other four. Apparently he will soon be ready to come to the subject of vaccination. But he has made new conditions and proposed new penalties for the disputant who falls. Frankly these propositions set in purple to me but in no circumstances could I accept his terms. I am convinced that if the third member of the proposed committee proved to be a vaccinationist I would have to work on the Sayre streets. I would be just as certain of the same result with a committee so constituted, as if a similar committee were empowered to pass judgment on any discussion of the subjects of free silver, free trade, free grace, predestination or baptism.

I much prefer to take my chances with the people. At any rate the penalty is too frightful for me. I like the other one better. I am like the tramp; I am willing to go to jail but I will not work. So there! If the doctor wants to discuss the subject with an Italian laborer he can have his way but if he prefers a contest with a student of the subject of vaccination he will probably have to forego the pleasure of the penalty prospect.

Dr. Cummings exhibits in the extreme the arrogance characteristic of those who know themselves to be in the majority so far as influence and power are concerned. But the vaccinationist should know that in a contest of this kind, one, with reason on his side is a majority. I cannot believe that any considerable proportion of the medical fraternity will continue to ignore obvious considerations presented by those who oppose compulsory vaccination, whether professional medical men or not. They have frequently yielded established tenets during the glorious history of their art and it will not hurt them to yield again when they find, by more careful investigation, that they have been led into error. Dr. Creighton, the great authority on vaccination, who wrote the vaccination article for the Encyclopedia Britanica, and who at one time was in favor of vaccination, became quite modest with extensive investigation of the subject, and wrote in the introduction to the said article: "It is right to say that the views expressed in the present article diverge in many points from the opinions generally received among medical men, and must be regarded not as the exposition of established and undisputed doctrine, but as the outcome of an independent and laborious research."

With the same careful and independent research would not physicians, generally, express themselves exactly the same way? Not necessarily that they had come to the same conclusion but that there was justification for doubt. This doubt is sufficient warrant for the demand for the repeal of all compulsory vaccination laws.

I have at last obtained copies of all the articles written by Dr. Cummings for the Williamsport Sun and other publications. Carefully scrutinizing them they appear to consist of unsupported assertions, abuse of anti-vac-nationalists, and a considerable array of old statistics which have many times been shown to be misleading so far as they are applied to the support of the theory of vaccination. These statistics are picked out here and there with seeming intention to fit the requirements of his contention. Students of statistics know very well that they cannot be applied to the determination of any subject in dispute, in a definite way. They can only be used comprehensively. If used specifically they can be made to prove almost anything. Dr. Dixon, State Commissioner of Health, says that figures lie, and we all know that in the way they are frequently used they do. Let us take an example from the doctor's statistics. He makes a specialty of compulsory Germany, and sets it off against non-compulsory Austria, greatly to the advantage of compulsion. But Germany has been under compulsion of the strictest kind for more than 30 years and yet the latest statistics available, show that she has nearly four times the deaths from smallpox per million inhabitants than non-compulsory Pennsylvania has and yet, according to the best information obtainable Austria is more thoroughly vaccinated than Pennsylvania. Austria, while not absolutely under compulsion, has similar laws to those of Pennsylvania and not in any respect less binding than are ours. The reason that Austria does not have absolute compulsion may be found in a report of Dr. Keller, head physician of the imperial railway, on smallpox cases among the employees of that company and their families, numbering some sixty thousand. After showing that a greater proportion of deaths occurred among the vaccinated than among the unvaccinated, he sums up the case as follows: "Having due regard to all these facts, it appears that VACCINATION IS UTTERLY WORTHLESS." There are many reasons why Austria can not be expected to show as clean a bill of health as Germany during the last thirty years, but it is impossible to obtain sufficient space in these articles for all particulars and therefore I will state the fact, that students are all aware of that Germany's environment is far better than Austria's.

The doctor displays statistics with the freshness of tyro but he must begin to perceive that the German-Austrian comparison is utterly futile and absurd. Certainly no other man with sufficient mental training to obtain a medical degree will fail to see it.

I shall continue to smash the other strongholds of vaccination as fast as the printer will give me space. I will not evade anything purposely. Once I was riding with a gentleman over a very rocky road. He had a good team and drove fast. At times we seemed in great danger of being thrown out. Noticing my evident apprehension he said: "If I miss any of the rocks and you will call my attention to it I will go back and try it again."

I shall not be less accommodating with the reader.
