A Substitute for Whalebone.

"There is an industrious German out in my town," said one of the Indiana men who make the Flfth Avenue their lounging place, "who has invented a substitute for whalebone so far as it enters into dress. Whalebone is now worth ters into dress. Whalebone is now worth its weight in silver and grows scarcer every year. This new thing is made from bullock hides, the oil being ex-tracted by chemical process and the hide rendered as tough as bone. He calls it 'amber bone,' I believe, though it isn't bone at all. It is a clear, transparent amber in color, and from all I hear of it I should suppose it would please the amber in color, and from all 1 hear of it I should suppose it would please the ladies who can't afford real whalebone. There have been a good many attempts of late years to produce a substitute for whalebone, without substantial success." —New York Herald.
