Forty railway trains going to and from London are provided through and through with electric lights.

American trains ought to be, all of them. The railway mail supering the su tendent recommends that the use of oil lamps in mail cars be stopped, both because of the danger and because of the soiling of mail matter from the dripping and spilling of the oil. Electric lighting on the cars of all the mail trains would doubtless be an expense, but it would be an expense, but it would be an expense that both the government and railway companies could well afford.
