The Pontiac conspiracy was or foot and the Susquehanna Indians who so earnestly desired to live peaceful lives were visited by roaving bands to get them to join in the lestruction of the English. The brotherhood at Bethlehem took them inder their protection and induced the government to provide a place of protection for them at Philadelphia where they remained until March 20 1765, when 83 of the christian converts left their confined home and under the protection of Papunhank made their way to Wyalusing. This point possessed many advantages for the support of a large colony. It was at the junction of to of the most important paths; the one leading from Tioga to Shamokin and the other from Chenango to Ostonwacken, now Montoursville, passing through our county. All was hopeful for a time finding however that their location was on too low ground, in 1767 the town moved to a higher location and a plot was surveyed and regularly laid out the main street eighty teet wide in the centre of which stood the church opposite of which was the mission house, on either side of the street were lots each thirty-two feet wide, each household had a canoe on the river. The village was enclosed with a post and rail fence and during the summer the streets were swept by the women every week and the refuse carried away while the women were taught to keep an orderly clean village and cultivate extensive fields of corn and other grain, the men still followed the hunt. They had an abundance of horses and all kinds of stock, sugar camps on both sides of the river, which were worked extensively in the season, and during the season the gathering of huckleberries and cranberries, flags for mats, ginseng and wild potatoes, so all were kept employed in productive labor. Their canoes were kept in constant requsition in transporting grain, hay and other products up and down the river.
