IS THERE A DEMAND?

DOES THE COUNTRY REALLY WANT TARIFF REVISION?

Strong Negative Testimony From a British Consul's Report That Until Trade Depression Comes the Tariff Will Remain as It Is.

"There is, however, as yet, no real demand from the ordinary citizen for a change in the tariff and will not be unless there is a very serious trade depression, which at present is not likely."

This is the official testimony of the British consul, Mr. Finn, stationed at Chicago, in a report regarding trade and industrial conditions in the district which comprises the territory he represents, made to his majesty's government through the foreign office. It is not the testimony of an enthusiastic protectionist American, but is that of a British official who, doubtless in the interests of the foreign trade of his countrymen in the British kingdom, would much like to see evidences that there is a demand among the American people for a revision of the tariff for this country and a scaling down of the rate of import duties.

From his station in the central northwest of the United States, in his official report to the foreign office, the British consul tells his people at home that there is no real demand from the ordinary citizen for a change in the American tariff system. He makes this statement in the face of the clamors of certain of our tariff revision politicians and so-called independent newspapers that the northwest is aghast with the demand for tariff revision. Consul Finn would make it his business to ascertain the facts, and he would not be inclined to keep the facts from British manufacturers who are desirous of getting goods into the American markets at lower customs duties if there was the slightest "real demand" among the people of the west for such changes in the tariff system. With his training as a British representative of the foreign office, born to conservatism and careful statement of the facts, British Consul Finn tells the manufacturers and exporters of Great Britain through his official report that there is no real demand for a change in the tariff among the American people in the territory covered by his consular district.

This report by a British consul stationed in the United States contains such valuable information which Americans may study with profit. It is a recent publication, having been received at the British foreign office on May 10, was immediately printed, and copies of it have been received here. The report covers more than 100 pages of closely printed matter and discusses in detail trade and industrial conditions throughout the northwestern states, including the markets and trade conditions in a half dozen principal cities and the trade and industries of a dozen states and two territories, from the Canadian line south to and including Oklahoma and Indian Territory. The scope of this report on conditions in these western and northwestern states may be known by a resume of the subjects of which it treats—namely, agriculture, including the many and varied products of the soil; manufactures of almost every description; labor conditions, imports and exports and a field of observation in general which reflects great credit upon the British official. The report affords some explanation for the extent of information which British exporters have obtained through their consuls in the United States regarding markets and conditions generally in this country.

There are so many points of interest to the American people in this British consular report on American affairs that it is difficult to select what is most instructive and interesting. One fact he mentions, however, will not be lost to the discriminating sense of our people. For example, he devotes some attention to the tin plate industry, especially with a view to setting before his British readers at home just what is being accomplished by American tin plate manufacturers. In view of the fact that the tin plate industry was the recipient of special protective duties for the encouragement of that industry in the United States, and that, too, at a time when there was practically no tin plate manufactured in the United States, some facts brought out for the information of his home people by this British consul are of particular value.

British Consul Finn naturally desires to inform his British friends just what is happening to them. He explains that American imports of tin plate, notably from Great Britain, materially decline. He says that until recently the British tin plate maker could sell plate to the American canners because the duty paid on British plate was refunded when the canned goods were exported. "But," he says, "the American manufacturer has in some way been able to meet this reduction in price."

Here is a British testimonial of what protection has done for an industry in the United States in not only curtailing purchases of manufactures from abroad and establishing a field for American capital and labor, but also in the short period of five years capturing a British province for the sales of an American manufactured article.

This British testimonial, given to the people of Great Britain by an officer of the British foreign office, is one of the best and most instructive and valuable that the cause of protection in the United States has received from any source.

Short Talks on Advertising By Charles Austin Bates.

People generally read advertisements more than they did a few years ago. The reason is to be found in the advertisements themselves.

Advertisers are more careful than they used to be. They make the advertisements more readable. Some of them even become, in a way, a department of the paper, and people look for them every day with as much zest and pleasure as they turn to any other feature.

This is true of many department stores all over the country.

In many cities there is just one man who appreciates the value of such interest.

He breaks away from the old set style. He tells something interesting in his space every day.

There are lots of interesting things in business. Look over the miscellany page of any paper—look at its local news columns, and its telegraph news, for that matter, and you'll see that the majority of the items are more or less closely related to some business fact.

Dress these facts up in a becoming garb of words, and they will find readers, even though they be in a "mere advertisement."

Let the merchant come down off his pedestal.

He needn't be flippant—far from it, but let him not write as if he were addressing somebody afar off, and telling him about something at even a greater distance.

The newspaper goes right into its reader's house—goes in and sits down with him.

It is on the table when he eats, and in his hands while he is smoking after the meal. It reaches him when he is in an approachable condition.

That's the time to tell him about your business—clearly, plainly, convincingly—as one man talks to another.

"The newspaper goes right into its reader's house and sits down with him."
