You saw him as at break of day on Monday morning he wended his way to the railroad station, loaded down with fishing tackle and with the bright flash of hope illumining his countenance. His walk was that of a supple man, his eye was bright and his smile appeared as if it had been cemented to his face. He was the early trout fisherman who in his mind's eye saw visions of a day of unalloyed sport and a basket of speckled beauties with which at night he would spread envy among the lazy, stay-at-home anglers.

You saw the same man about noon as he wended his weary way back along the street, his nose resembling a sixteen-candle power incandescent electric light, his cheeks bearing that ruddy carmine which denotes contact with polar weather and his basket devoid of fish. It was the same early fisherman who started out in the morning full of expectancy and determination to be among the first who should throw a worm to the hungry trout in the brook. But the man was not boasting of his success.
