Sonsetown Defeated.
Saturday afternoon the Laporte base ball team played with Sonsetown at this place, winning by a score of 18-11. We promised the Sonsetown boys not to say much about it, and our feelings would not permit us to do so anyway, for they are a good bunch and hard players but their training in ballology has been insufficient to allow them a victory over Laporte. An unusual feature of the game was the batting of three flies in one inning, by Sonsetown, to each of Laporte's out fielders, which were captured. The Carpenter brothers twirled the ball for the home team and Wheatley of Estella, pitched for Sonsetown.

Camp Day.
The annual Camp Day exercises of Camb Mokoma will be held in the High School auditorium on Wednesday evening, Aug. 24, at eight o'clock. The ceremonies of the evening will include the reading of the camp poem, camp history, camp prophecy, and the presentation of humorously applicable gifts to each member of Camp. Songs and cheers will be sprinkled throughout the program, and the evening will close with the performance of "Box and Cox," one of the most amusing farces ever written. An offering will be taken the proceeds of which will be given to the V. I. S. and for the school library.

The late Bill Nye had a faculty of telling the truth in a quaint way. One of his sayings was: "Our wagon roads are a disgrace to civilization, and before we undertake to supply underwear and Bibles with flexible backs to the Africans we might as well put a few dollars into the relief of galled and broken down horses that have lost their health on our miserable highways." A well kept road pays 200 per cent profit on the investment to the farmer whose farm adjoins it.—Tewanba Review.

THE YOUNG MAN FROM WYOMING
AT EAGLES MERE.

A SULLIVAN COUNTY NOVELETTE.

BY THOMAS J. INGHAM.

"At length there came a telegram from her husband saying: 'I was wounded in battle and brought to the hospital at Petersburg. My wound is serious but I hope not dangerous.' Although Anna had hoped he might escape unharmed, she had always kept herself in readiness to go to him on short notice, and in an hour she was on her way to Washington. There, through the assistance of a friend who was a member of Congress, she obtained the necessary passes to enable her to reach Petersburg. After delays which seemed to her interminable, she at last arrived in Petersburg and hastened to the hospital. There she found upon his narrow hospital bed her pale, wounded soldier. She came to him like a great flood of light, and the happiness of their meeting for the moment made them forget the danger, and feel that it only needed a few weeks nursing to make him well, and then they would go home together.

After their first happy greetings were over, Anna began practically to see what he needed and what she could do for him. Her heart sank when she found the wound was in his body and the ball could not be extracted. The surgeon, however, encouraged her to hope, and at times she felt quite sure he would get well. If tender, skilful attention could have saved him he would have been saved. Her energy never abated; her resources seemed never exhausted; her youth and beauty and devotion to her husband inspired the surgeons to their utmost skill; and yet he became weaker and weaker, and at last died with his head upon her bosom.

Her grief was heartrending, but she felt her work was not all done. It was no common task at that time and place to get the help, the means, and permits necessary to remove the body to Philadelphia for interment, but this she accomplished.

When the funeral was over, she did not allow herself to sink into despondency, but determined to return to the hospital and nurse the wounded soldiers. To her father and mother, who remonstrated, she said, 'Having been there and seen them, and knowing what I can do, I must go.' She took with her several elderly ladies who were experienced nurses, and together they helped many wounded soldiers to return to the loved ones at home, and smoothed the dark road for many others.

When the war ended and their services were no longer needed, they returned to Philadelphia. Since then her father has died, leaving a very moderate income to his widow, and the only independent income Mrs. Belois has is the pension she draws from the government. She has given time to many practical good works, and has shown tact and ability in all she undertakes. She has never married again, although her husband has been dead about fifteen years.

"This is the substance of the information I have gathered which I hope will be satisfactory to you. Your friend, H. W."

When Lessingham had finished reading the letter he muttered, "Divorce! Folly! Nonsense! Why did I allow myself to be fooled by such indefinite conversation? I might have guessed she was a widow. I might have known such a pure woman would not have treated me so—well, so friendly, if she had a living husband. There is nothing in her position to impede my wishes, but how is it with mine? What will she say when she hears the truth concerning me? That I will find out; the truth she shall know about me, and then if she will have me, we will be married; if not, we part forever!"

CHAPTER FOUR.

At the earliest opportunity after Lessingham received the information from Philadelphia he visited Mrs. Belois. He no longer visited her as "Doctor," for she was so near well that not even an excuse could be made for a visit on that score. When he called he was fortunate enough to find her alone. There had been such a distance between them of late that he hardly knew how to approach the conversation he wished to have with her. It was not a mere proposal he wished to make. He could have reached that without much preamble. What he wished was to tell her certain facts about himself before he led her to commit herself in any way, and then he thought if she accepted him it would be with her eyes open and he might hope for her complete love. Without that he did not wish a marriage.

Perceiving that he was not his case, Mrs. Belois commenced a light bantering conversation, and among other things remarked:

"Doctor, are gentlemen as much opposed to telling their ages as ladies?"

"Really, I don't know how much opposition ladies have to telling their ages, so I can't answer that."

"Well, Doctor, I heard a lady express her opinion about your age the other day."

"Indeed, what did she think about it?"

"I guess what she said won't disturb you any, so I'll tell. She thought you must be about thirty."

"Thirty? I ought not to complain of that; perhaps you think I am older?"

"I? Oh, I was not telling my thoughts."

"Won't you oblige me then, by telling your honest opinion about my age?"

"If it will oblige you I will; but really, Doctor, I think I have been a little impertinent in raising the question, and I am willing to let it drop just here."

"Not the least impertinence, Mrs. Belois, in anything you have said, and if you will tell me your honest opinion about my age, I will then tell you the truth about it. We'll see how close you can guess."

"I think, Doctor," said she, with much consideration, "that you are not far from thirty-five."

"We'll mark that guess down, Mrs. Belois, and when I tell you my age you will see how near you have it; but before I tell you my age I want permission to tell you the story of my life."

"Whatever you wish to tell me, Doctor, I shall be pleased to hear."

"The story I have to tell is not a short one, and is for your ears alone. It is too late to commence it to-night, and we should be interrupted here. If you will go with me in the boat tomorrow, I will tell it to you."

"Very well, I will go."

After arranging the time when he was to call for Mrs. Belois in the morning, Mr. Lessingham bade her good-night.

CHAPTER FIVE.

The morning was delightful, and promised to be one of those days which late summer at the lake so often affords; when the sun beams with genial warmth, the winds are hushed, and the water a mirror for the green trees and blue sky.

Mr. Lessingham called for Mrs. Belois at the appointed hour, and they walked together to the lake. When they were in the boat, and fairly out upon the transparent water, Mr.
